I saw the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and with him saw the present Secretary of the Interior, before whom I stated all the facts, giving all the information in my possession, submitting to them the whole case, and asking them what should be done. I was by them told to put my communication in writing; but before doing so I learned from the Secretary that the Poncas would be removed, and that, if necessary—and that, if necessary, troops would be called upon to enforce the removal.

I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin—

He put his statement in writing and signed it; it is on file in the Interior Department; and in that he declares it to be his view that they should be removed and troops used if necessary. He returned to his work, and the Commissioner telegraphs him his approval. He stops in Chicago, at the headquarters of the Army, and there learns that troops would be sent him by boat; goes back to his work and completes it with forty soldiers, between whom were marched these Ponca Indians out of their home and to the Territory.

Was the Secretary ignorant of this outrage? This is the outrage; there is no other laid to anybody's door. Who is responsible for it if the man who ordered it done is not? Out of this unlawful enforced removal of these men grew this wrong, and the purpose to do it carried along with it all the unlawful outrages that have followed. There was no authority of law for doing what was done, and Congress has in no particular ratified that act. It is an unlawful act to-day, and all that flowed from it is unlawful. There is, I answer the Senator from Wisconsin, no other evidence in the Interior Department, if we can rely on the call upon it for information, that shows any consent whatever.

I repeat that to claim that they gave their consent is to dispute the wrong itself, which is admitted by the Secretary. The purpose to, in violation of law, take these Indians to the Indian Territory runs through all subsequent acts. Out of it grew the imprisonment of the two brothers in Dakota. Out of it grew the seizing by soldiers, in the peaceable home of the Omahas, of Standing Bear and his associates. Out of it grew the imprisonment of Big Snake and his two associates, for three long months, in order to overawe his people unlawfully held in the Territory. Out of it grew the subsequent attempt by soldiers without authority of law to manacle Big Snake in the office of the agent, in which he was slain. Out of it grew the arrest of friends of these Poncas, paying them friendly visits for friendly offices, and the marching them out of the Territory. Out of it grew a determination on the part of those who inspired and did it to obtain from Congress an enactment that would fix these prisoners by a law in the Territory. In 1878 this Secretary sent to the Indian Committee a bill enacting that his prisoners should be taken off his hands and held by law in the Territory. And now that diplomacy coming in to the aid of force has proved too much for these Indians, it is boasted that fifty millions of civilized people have been more than a match for five hundred barbarous Poncas, and have wrung out of them, out of their very despair, their consent to remain in the Indian Territory. When the President, moved by a public doubt in this matter, sent a commission to the Territory to make plain the real condition of things and to report to him, (I use the words of the commission,) what justice and humanity required to be done, they, on the ground, while meeting evidence from the lips of the Indians that they were willing to stay there, felt that justice and humanity required that in any redress of grievances they should be permitted to choose their home either in the Indian Territory or in Dakota. The President, in that manly message so creditable to his head and his heart with which he communicated to Congress that report, urged upon Congress that redress, but upon the condition that the Poncas should have free choice of their home in the Indian Territory or in Dakota.

Thereupon the man who set in motion this work held these men under the strong power of the Government, to use the language of General Miles, as prisoners, undertook to arraign the commissioners before a committee of this body for recommending that these men have permission to seek their home in either the Indian Territory or in Dakota as they chose, and has prepared a bill and sent it to a committee of this body providing that it shall not be lawful for them to choose their home between the Indian Territory and Dakota, and no relief can come through Congress to them which contains that free choice except it be over the opposition of the man who signs this letter.

Sir, this is the record of the Ponca Indians; this is the true character of that proceeding out of which this great wrong was inflicted upon that people. I have shown who, with full knowledge of these facts, ordered it to be done. I have shown who, in carrying out that purpose, has laid violent hands upon human rights for the last three years; and I have shown who it is that stands now in the way of all redress to that people that does not take away from them the right to choose their home, whether it be in the Indian Territory or at their old home in Dakota.

The man who has this record upon his official acts will take his place in the court where men's acts are tried not in the prosecutor's chair. He is the last man to arraign a Senator in his place for the discharge of his official duty. To the criticisms of this Senate, in which I have had a seat for six years, and above that, to the criticisms of that Commonwealth which has trusted me so long and so much, I will ever bow; but I will not listen to the man with this record upon him who comes to arraign me for my official acts. I submit to the Senate whether it is becoming such a man to stalk into this Senate Chamber, with the mace of executive authority in his hands, and attempt to lecture a member of this body upon the manner in which he discharges his duty here.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALLACE. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Chair will first lay before the Senate some bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 1102) granting a pension to John S. Corlett;

A bill (H. R. No. 4610) granting a pension to Mary Leggett; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5677) granting a pension to Stephen P. Benton.

The bill (H. R. No. 6535) to allow marshals and deputy marshals to take bond in certain cases was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 3520) to establish a port of delivery at Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

KANAWHA RIVER TOLLS.

Mr. CONKLING submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas appropriations have been made for ten years past by Congress for the improvement of the Great Kanawha River of West Virginia under the direction of the War Department; and

Whereas a company calling itself the Kanawha Board, under some pretended authority, not of Congress, assumed to levy and collect tolls on the commerce of said river from the town of Charleston to the mouth of the river flowing into the Ohio: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the fact and authority of the said Kanawha Board's levy of tolls on navigable waters of the United States accessible from other States and waters than those of West Virginia and to report such remedy as shall seem expedient.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Mr. WALLACE. I gave notice on Wednesday that I should ask the Senate to hear me this morning upon the constitutional amendment submitted by myself. I yielded the floor to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] for a personal explanation, and I trust the Senate will permit me to go on now in accordance with the notice heretofore given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, on the 28th of January last I had the honor to submit for the consideration of the Senate joint resolution No. 148, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which is in these words:

That hereafter the President and Vice-President of the United States shall be chosen by the people of the respective States in the manner following:

Each State shall be divided by the Legislature thereof into districts, equal in number to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in the Congress of the United States, the said districts to be composed of contiguous territory, and to contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of persons entitled to be represented under the Constitution, and to be laid off for the first time immediately after the ratification of this amendment, and afterward at the session of the Legislature next ensuing the apportionment of Representatives by the Congress of the United States; but no alteration after the first or after each decennial formation of districts shall take effect at the next ensuing election after such alteration is made. That on the first Tuesday in the month of November of the year 1884, and on the same days in every fourth year thereafter, the citizens of each State who possess the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature shall meet at the places provided by State law within their respective districts and vote by secret ballot for a President and Vice-President of the United States, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with the voter; and the person receiving the greatest number of votes for President and the one receiving the greatest number of votes for Vice-President in each district shall each be holden to have received one vote, which fact shall be immediately certified to the board of canvassers of the State, to each of the Senators in Congress from such State, and to the President of the Senate. The votes shall be canvassed and the result in each district ascertained from the returns by the governor, the chief justice of the highest court of law, and the secretary of State of the proper State, who shall constitute the board of State canvassers, and they shall certify the result in said State to the Speaker of the House of Representatiqes of the United States within sixty days after the election, and their certificate shall be conclusive proof of such result. The Congress of the United States shall be in session on the second Monday in February, in the year 1885, and on the same day in every fourth year thereafter; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, shall open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted by the two Houses in joint convention met. The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President, and the person having the greatest number of votes for Vice-President shall be Vice-President of the United States.

This amendment contemplates a change in that provision of the Constitution of the United States which regulates the election of President and Vice-President by substituting for the electoral colleges a direct vote of the people for the candidates themselves. The electoral college has failed to answer the purposes for which those who originated it intended it. It was thought at the time of the formation of the Constitution that the substitution of a body of intelligent and leading citizens between the people and the candidates would enable the country, in the event of difficulty, to depend upon their judgment, integrity, and high position for the solution of those difficulties. The reverse of this has proved to be the fact in practice. Party discipline, party caucus, and the recognized will of party control, compel the electors to vote for the candidates named in their party caucus. It is the purpose of this resolution to substitute the will of the people directly expressed for this system. I submit it now with no hope of its immediate adoption, but as a contribution to the agitation from which alone a change can come.

The features of the system are:

First. The division by the Legislature of each State into districts, equal in number to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State is entitled in Congress. Delaware, for instance, would be entitled to 3 votes, and would be divided by its own Legislature into three districts.

Second. The people are to vote in these districts, at an uniform time, directly for their candidate for President and Vice-President, one of whom, as at present, shall not be a citizen of the State in which the voter resides.

Third. The person having the highest number of votes in each district (a plurality being sufficient) to be entitled to one vote out of the whole number to which the State is entitled. Pennsylvania having 29 votes would have probably cast 10 democratic and 19 republican votes at the recent election.

Fourth. The returns of these votes to be made to the governor, chief-justice, and secretary of State, who shall canvass and return the same, which shall be conclusive proof of how the State voted.

Fifth. The votes thus returned to be counted by the two Houses in joint convention met.

Sixth. The person having the highest number of votes from all of the districts voting (a plurality being sufficient) to be elected.

Seventh. The qualifications of voters, the division of the State into districts, and the canvass of individual votes to be under control of the State and the mode of voting to be the secret ballot.

The districts are to be formed after each census of the United States has been taken, and are first to be formed immediately after the adoption of the amendment. No change in the districts can take effect at the first election after such change.

The qualifications of electors, as now prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for members of Congress, are preserved, and the universality of a secret ballot is enforced. The votes cast in each district by the electors, when computed by the election officers, are to be returned to the State canvassing board, and whoever shall have received the highest number of votes in such district shall be held to have received one vote. The whole number of votes cast for each candidate in all the districts in any State are to be ascertained by a canvassing board, composed of the governor, chief-justice, and secretary of State, and they are within sixty days after the election to certify the number of votes by districts received by each candidate in each State to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. This return is to be the only and conclusive proof of the result in that State. The returns thus made to the Speaker of the House are to be laid before the two Houses in joint convention met, at the usual time, and they are authorized and empowered there to count the vote and determine the result. The candidate for President and Vice-President, respectively, receiving the highest number of votes out of the whole number of districts voting, shall be declared elected President and Vice-President of the United States, thus substituting the plurality vote both in the districts and of the districts for the majority rule of the States or of the electoral colleges which is now in operation.

It will be noted that this system changes, first, the electoral college to a direct vote by the people in districts; second, the plurality or majority in each district contribute one vote to the election of President and Vice-President directly; third, the State has entire control of the elections and the certificate thereof to Congress; fourth, the two Houses, acting together, are given sole power to count the votes; fifth, the necessity for a majority of the electoral college and for action in any event by the House of Representatives voting by States is dispensed with, and the plurality rule by districts adopted.

The district system is no new thought in the politics of this country. It found its origin in the constitutional convention of 1787, on the motion of Judge Wilson, of Pennsylvania, and it was initiated in Congress in the very early days of our history. It has been elaborated and enforced from time to time by leading Senators and members of the House, as an abstract of our history, which I give herewith, will prove:

This is not a process of entire and absolute consolidation by a direct vote of the whole people of all the States, but it is a vote by the people, in the districts made by the State, directly for the candidates, which votes are to be returned to State authority and conclusively certified thereby as the result of State action. In this respect it is as different from an universal vote throughout the whole country ascertaining results by its aggregate as is the present system from a direct vote by the people.

One of the leading purposes to be attained by this amendment is representation of the minority in each State, and as a consequence the destruction and absolute eradication of sectionalism. Under this system in the last election Pennsylvania would have probably chosen nineteen electors for Garfield and ten for Hancock, while Virginia would have given eight for Hancock and three for Garfield. It is simple and direct, but it professes to contain no new thought. It is the mere application of what we have come to recognize as the American system of elections to the practical working of the Federal Constitution in the election of President and Vice-President.

In the elections of our county and State officials as well as in the election of members of Congress, the person having the highest number of votes, whether he have a majority or a minority, is the chosen candidate, but at present under the Federal system a majority of the whole electoral vote, or of the States in the House of Representatives, is required. I can see no sufficient reason now for this difference, if the just voice of each State can be preserved. Our experience teaches us that there is no longer any necessity for the continuance of the rigid majority rule. State equality in the Senate and State independence in its vote are, by the district system as herein embodied, fully preserved.

I can see no practical reason for compelling a majority of all the States, as such, to be obtained either by the useless processes of the electoral colleges or, failing that, of the vote by the House of Representatives by States, with all its dangers of civil war, corruption, and anarchy. The preservation and recognition of the equal and independent voice of each State and of the minority as well as of the majority of its people is to my mind the vital thought, and although a plurality elects, my judgment is that we will as frequently elect a majority President under the district system as under the system now in operation.

There can be no good reason, as I see it, why a plurality of the American people should not control when they have fair opportunities and free suffrage in the selection of their rulers; nor can I conceive any reason why it is essential now to preserve the old thought that a majority of the States should cast their electoral votes for any candidate before there is an election, in face of the fact that he is often in a minority of the whole people. Under the present system there are many instances in which while the candidate elected has a majority of the electoral colleges he has a minority of the people. This was notably the case in 1876, as it was in 1860 and is in the recent election to a smaller extent. It seems to me better to err in the other direction if we must err at all. For all purposes needed to effect Federal results, the thought that is embodied in our every-day practice in electing township, city, county, and State officials and Congressmen can now well and profitably be embodied in the Federal Constitution.

The lesson of the election just completed by the count by the House this week is full of instruction. There are 369 electoral votes. Garfield received 214, Hancock, without Georgia, 144. If New York had cast her 35 votes for Hancock, the vote of Georgia would have been required to decide the contest, or the House would have been compelled to elect, for with New York voting for Hancock there would have been a tie at 179 votes, and a tie in the House voting by States would probably have resulted; and thus the peace of the country might have been broken by the tremendous convulsions consequent on such a condition of affairs. The plurality rule would obviate all this.

By this amendment the States are not divided into districts upon the ratio on which their representation in the lower House of Congress would be fixed, but there is given to each State as such, in addition to its representation in the lower House, her equal representation in the Senate. So that while New York has thirty-three members of the lower House, she has 35 votes for President; and while Rhode Island has but two members of the lower House, she has 4 votes for President. By this is preserved State individuality and State control, and to my mind sufficient of the Federal system, if we stand by the plain reading of the Constitution in other respects.

The correction of the vicious system of marked ballots is provided for also by prescribing a secret ballot, and although this enters the domain of State control, its wisdom as well as its necessity seem to me to be apparent.

The danger so apparent to us all in recent years of anarchy and confusion from the doubts as to the true method of counting the votes for President and Vice-President, and from disputes as to who shall control and declare them, is provided for by the return of the State being made conclusive proof and by Congress being made the controlling power when in joint convention met.

These are some of the thoughts to which this amendment gives force. I shall endeavor now to elaborate them further and to meet some of the objections to this system toward which I have no doubt the minds of Senators are tending.

The present system of choosing electors is based upon the constitutional provision that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct," its electors for President and Vice-President. The power of the State Legislatures to appoint electors themselves, to authorize the people to choose them by ballot upon general ticket, and also to choose them in districts, is given by this provision. In practice and as a result of popular opinion, they are now chosen by the people in every State upon general ticket; but our history has seen all three of these modes of choice in operation at one time. Instability and opportunity for chicane and management, therefore, exist, which, in so grave a matter, are dangerous in the extreme, and an uniform system of universal application, and under whatever control, is manifestly better under existing conditions than this complex arrangement. An uniform system is better than a triple system, as popular will is better than either electoral or legislative will. The power of party and the sectional line have made the electoral system an utter failure, and our people will not tolerate the choice of their rulers by the Legislatures. We are left, then, to but the two systems, the universal direct vote of the whole people or a direct vote of the people under State control by districts. The first and greatest difficulty in the way of an universal direct vote of the whole people of all the States is that it is utter destruction of the federative system and produces practical consolidation. By it, State lines are obliterated and State independence and equality are lost sight of. Under it a few populous States voting for a candidate popular there, would overwhelm the remainder, or by the division of their people a small State giving a large majority for one candidate would outweigh the voice of many larger ones. In the late election the majority in Texas for one candidate was greater than the aggregate majorities in New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio for the other.

The preservation of the federative system utterly forbids the universal direct vote. It would not aid in the destruction of sectional feeling, but the very reverse, for the tendency of majorities is always to grow, and when based upon passion or interest, sectional majorities invariably increase. Such a rule would perpetuate bitterness, for the result would demonstrate that there was a nearly equal division of the people of one section and a decided preponderance of those of the other which would overcome the former. An universal direct vote can never be had, except under a new compact in which the smaller States will agree to surrender their equality and independence, and this is neither desired nor desirable.

Under the system of a direct vote by districts, each State has precisely the same relative weight as now. Pennsylvania would cast twenty-nine votes; she has now twenty-nine electors and twenty-nine members of Congress. Rhode Island would cast four votes; she has now four electors and four members of Congress. It is true that in the election by the people in districts a part of the districts would vote for one person and a part for another, so that the result would be to some extent national more than State; but this is the case with members of the House of Representatives now, and the small States have due and full weight and power in the fact that the large States are nearly all closely divided in politics, and the votes of the districts will follow in nearly the same proportion. A gerrymander is the only argument against this, but even the worst of gerrymanders is preferable to the dangers and evils of the present system.

It has been well said that—

> Under the present system, the State voting solidly, there is great temptation to fraud. Where the condition of parties is nearly balanced in a State, a successful fraud may determine the vote of the whole State. This puts the whole votes of States in the hands of the large cities. The material with which to perpetrate frauds predominates especially in large cities, such as New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and New Orleans. Under the district system the frauds in the large cities would only affect the vote in the district in which they occurred, and could not, in their consequences, extend to the vote of the whole State. But under the present system the successful city fraud may determine the vote of the whole State.
> Where the fraud will only affect the vote of a single district, the temptations to commit it are greatly diminished. Men will not take the risks and incur the expense of committing a great fraud to carry the vote of a single district, which they would do if the result of the fraud was to determine the vote of the whole State, and perhaps secure the election of a President.

The electoral system is an election by States and not by the people, and in effect prevents the voter from expressing his choice for President unless he follows party caucus or convention, and even then he cannot vote directly for the man of his choice. This rule works results which are more aristocratic than republican. Sectional lines will be broken up by the district system, and "a promiscuous division of sentiment extending over the whole nation and not capable of being delineated by State lines or the course of rivers" will take the place of a solid North and a solid South. Geographical locality will not so completely identify the political character of the voter as now, for each candidate will find votes in every section.

Mr. Pickens said in the House in 1814:

> By any mode of giving an entire vote to each State the will of the majority of the people of the Union is not certain to prevail. A State however divided will give the same united vote with a State however unanimous.
> A reason against any mode of giving the undivided vote of the States, of all others the most important, and most affecting the vital interests of the Union, is its tendency toward a geographical severance of parties. By the principle of self-defense all the States must adopt such a mode, unless a uniform plan is established; indeed, they have nearly all so acted at the late election as to give unanimous votes; and by this means a whole section of the Union, with a small exception, voted for one individual while the opposite section supported his opponent, and these sections are divided by regular State lines. Now does a Chief Magistrate so elected appear to represent the whole Union; and will not a small number of repetitions of such events naturally draw the opposite parties in looking toward their opponents to look directly across this divisional line?

A direct vote of the people for the candidate of their choice is their right, and the electoral system was a device of those who did not trust the people, to deprive them of this right. The electoral plan was regarded with suspicion and aversion by the adherents of Jefferson. Alexander Hamilton, the father of the federal party, who desired the establishment of a strong national government, and who favored a life tenure for the President, subject only to impeachment, was the author of the electoral system. The historical fact is that the electoral college is simply a relic of the aristocratic theory of government insisted upon by the old-time federalists. It was accepted by the earlier democrats because they were obliged to take the Constitution as a whole and could not accept or reject it in part.

Mr. Hamilton writing in the Federalist (paper No. 68) refers to the manner of choosing the President provided for in the Constitution in the following language:

> It was desirable that the sense of the people should operate in the choice of the person to whom so important a trust was to be confided. This end will be answered by committing the right of making it not to any pre-established body, but to men chosen by the people for the special purpose and at the particular conjuncture. It was equally desirable that the immediate election should be made by men most capable of analyzing the qualities adapted to the station, and acting under circumstances favorable to deliberation and to a judicious combination of all the reasons and inducements that were proper to govern their choice. A small number of persons selected by their fellow-citizens from the general mass will be most likely to possess the information and discernment requisite to so complicated an investigation.

Distrust of the popular will cannot be more clearly expressed than in the language just quoted. The advocates of a strong government had no faith in the ability of the people to govern themselves. Their constant aim was to concentrate the powers of government in the hands of a select few. Among other instrumentalities employed by them to carry out their purposes was the electoral college. They desired that the power to select the President should be vested in "a small number of citizens." They believed the popular mass incapable of making an intelligent choice, and therefore they devised a plan by which, to quote the language of Hamilton, the immediate election would be "made by men capable of analyzing the qualities adapted to the station." But the design of the federalists was frustrated by the democratic influences, which have finally made the electors mere agents for the registry of the popular will. Instead of exercising their own choice, as they are empowered to do by the Constitution, they simply cast their votes as they are directed by that portion of the people who choose them at the ballot-box. Nevertheless the electoral machinery itself is the same old aristocratic contrivance which now by common consent has become useless for any purpose save to thwart the people in expressing their choice, and, as we all know, is dangerous in its execution.

In the convention of 1787, Pennsylvania was the only State voting for the election of President by popular vote, and her sons, Wilson and Morris, advocated with power and eloquence the system of election in districts by the popular vote. This proposition received but the votes of Pennsylvania and Maryland. Her sons believe now, as Franklin, Morris, Wilson, Jackson, and Benton taught, "the State is the people," and the expression of their voice by their direct vote under the federative and not the national system is, I believe, their wish now. In the debate in the Virginia convention on the adoption of the Constitution, James Monroe, afterward President of the United States, said, referring to the mode of electing the President contained in the Constitution:

> The President might be elected by the people, dependent upon them, and responsible for maladministration. As this is not the case I must disapprove of this clause in its present form.

In President Jackson's first annual message he earnestly pressed upon Congress the importance of so amending the Constitution as to dispense with all intermediate agencies in the election of President and Vice-President. Said he:

> To the people belongs the right of electing their Chief Magistrate; it was never designed that their choice should in any case be defeated, either by the intervention of electoral colleges, or by the agency confided, in certain contingencies, to the House of Representatives.
> I would therefore recommend such an amendment of the Constitution as may remove all intermediate agency in the election of President and Vice-President. The mode may be so regulated as to preserve to each State its present relative weight in the election; and a failure in the first attempt may be provided for by confining the second to a choice between the two highest candidates.

He recommended also a limitation of the presidential service to a single term of four or six years.

General Jackson renewed the above recommendation in each of his seven annual messages following; and he was especially earnest in his desire to prevent any election for President ever being determined by the House of Representatives.

The arguments in behalf of the popular vote by districts which have been made by statesmen of the past are so full and convincing that it is only necessary to read them to be convinced. Jackson, Van Buren, Benton, Calhoun, Dickerson of New Jersey, McDuffie, Pickens, Johnson, Morton, and scores of others are on record in its advocacy, and my argument is complete when I bring to the notice of the Senate and the country their reasons for their belief through an abstract of the history of their measures for its accomplishment.

2. By James Wilson, of Pennsylvania:

That the States be divided into —— districts, and that the persons qualified to vote in each district for members of the first branch of the national legislature elect —— members for their respective districts to be electors of the executive magistracy; that the said electors of the executive magistracy meet at —— and they, or any —— of them, so met, shall proceed to elect by ballot, but not out of their own body, —— person in whom the executive authority of the national government shall be vested.—Ibid., 143.

Rejected—nays 9, Delaware divided. (Ibid., page 174.)

4. The original draught of article 2, section 1 of the Constitution, as finally adopted, provided that in case there was no choice by the electors "the Senate shall choose by ballot the President" from the five highest on the list. Reported by committee of eleven. (Ibid., page 507.)

5. John Rutledge, of South Carolina, proposed election of President by joint ballot of the two houses of congress. (Ibid., page 472.)

The supreme executive authority of the United States to be vested in a governor, to be elected to serve during good behavior, the election to be made by electors, chosen by electors, chosen by the people in the election districts aforesaid—

i.e. by districts into which he proposed the States should be divided for the election of senators. (5 Elliot's Debates, 205.)

8. By Oliver Ellsworth, of Connecticut:

To be chosen by electors, appointed by the legislatures of the States in the following ratio, to wit: one for each State not exceeding 200,000 inhabitants; two for each above that number and not exceeding 300,000; and three for each State exceeding 300,000.

The question being divided on the first part, "shall the President be chosen by electors?" Carried—yeas 6, nays 3. On second part, "shall electors be chosen by the State legislature?" Carried—yeas 8, nays 2. (Ibid., page 338.)

9. By Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, (as a compromise:)

That the executive be chosen by electors to be taken by lot from the national legislature.—5 Elliot's Debates, 362.

10. The plan finally adopted (section 1, article 2 of the Constitution) agreed to by a vote of 10 to 1 on Sherman's motion to strike out "Senate shall immediately close" and insert "the House of Representatives shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for President, the members from each State having one vote." (Ibid., pages 519, 520.)

[NOTE.—It was the almost unanimous opinion of members of the Federal Convention, that if the executive should be chosen by the national legislature he should be ineligible a second time. (Ibid., page 337.)]

As a compromise and to guard against evils incident to election by Congress, Gouverneur Morris moved that choice be made "by electors chosen by the people of the several States." (Ibid., page 473.)

2. ARGUMENTS IN THE FEDERAL CONVENTION.

Gouverneur Morris, of Pennsylvania, opposed a choice by Congress. Was in favor of election "by the people at large, by the freeholders of the country," on the ground that there can be no "combination of populous States;" that the people at large will always be well informed as to "the great and illustrious characters who merit their esteem and confidence," and that "if chosen by the national legislature he will not be independent of it;" and if not independent, "usurpation and tyranny will be the consequence." (5 Elliot's Debates, 322, 323, 334.)

Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, favored the district system, and opposed election by national legislature, on the ground that "the executive in that case would be too dependent to stand the mediator between the intrigues and sinister views of the representatives and the general liberties and interests of the people." (Ibid., page 323.)

Mr. Madison, in favoring a choice by electors, said:

If it be a fundamental principle of free government that the legislative, executive, and judiciary powers should be separately exercised, it is equally so that they be independently exercised. There is the same, and perhaps greater, reason why the executive should be independent of the legislature than why the judiciary should. A coalition of the two former powers would be more immediately and certainly dangerous to public liberty. * * * He was disposed, for these reasons, to refer the appointment to some other source. The people at large was, in his opinion, the fittest in itself. The people generally could only know and vote for some citizen whose merits had rendered him an object of general attention and esteem. There was one difficulty, however, of a serious nature attending an immediate choice by the people. The right of suffrage was much more diffusive in the Northern than the Southern States, and the latter could have no influence in the election, on the score of the negroes. The substitution of electors obviated this difficulty, and seemed, on the whole, to be liable to fewest objections.—5 Elliot's Debates, 337.

ARTICLE II, SECTION 1, CLAUSES 1 AND 2 OF CONSTITUTION—OUR PRESENT ELECTORAL SYSTEM.

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and together with the Vice-President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

See twelfth amendment, which supersedes and annuls clause 3 of article 2, section 1.

ARTICLE II, SECTION 1—THE TWELFTH AMENDMENT.

1. The old system.—The difficulties attending the election of Jefferson and Burr were anticipated as early as 1797. The mode of election provided in section 1 of article 2 was regarded as fatally defective. The election of a Chief Magistrate had provoked more discussion in the Federal Convention than any other feature of the Constitution, and the ill-digested compromise finally effected was the least satisfactory to the members of that body. As the electoral system was regarded in Congress with less favor than any other part of the Constitution its reform was the subject of the first important amendment proposed. The statesmen of that period foresaw the dangers that would result from uncertainty in the mode of electing a Chief Magistrate, and accordingly William Smith, of South Carolina, in the House, January 6, 1797, proposed an amendment to the effect that "the electors of President and Vice-President be directed to designate whom they vote for as President, and for whom as Vice-President." (Annals, Fourth Congress, page 1824.)

The same proposition was renewed in the House by Mr. Foster, of New Hampshire, February 16, 1799. (Annals, Fifth Congress, page 2919.)

And in the Senate, by Humphrey Marshall, of Kentucky, January 24, 1798, in Fifth Congress, requiring electors to write on their ballots the names of persons voted for as President and Vice-President. (Ibid., page 493.)

January 24, 1800, a committee of five was appointed by the Senate to consider "what provisions ought to be made by law for deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President, and for determining the legality or illegality of the votes given for those officers in the different States." (Ibid., Sixth Congress, page 29.)

February 4, 1800, an amendment was proposed in the House requiring electors to disignate persons voted for as President and Vice-President. (Ibid., page 510.)

The district system.—In the House, March 14, 1800, John Nicholas, of Virginia, submitted the following amendment:

That, after the 3d day of March, 1801, the choice of electors of President and Vice-President shall be made by dividing each State into a number of districts, equal to the number of electors to be chosen in such States, and by the persons in each of those districts, who shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of such State, choosing one elector in the manner which the Legislature thereof shall prescribe.

Referred to committee of five. (Ibid., page 785.)

January 22, 1801, the committee of five submitted an elaborate report to the House, describing the variety of modes practiced in different States under article 2, section 1, declaring that "a mode of electing the President and Vice-President which might at once combine the expression of the public sentiments of the people of the respective States, with a perfect assurance of the due appointment of the electors for that important purpose, is a discovery greatly to be desired," but that it was inexpedient to change the Constitution in the manner proposed by Mr. Nicholas. (Ibid., pages 941–946.)

January 30, 1801, James A. Bayard, of Delaware, submitted a joint resolution to the House providing that when two persons have an equal number of electoral votes the House shall immediately choose one of them for President. (Ibid., page 987.)

Referred to committee of fifteen February 2, 1801. (Ibid., page 990.)

Report made February 6, 1801, embracing rules on which the Jefferson-Burr contest was decided. (Ibid., pages 1005 to 1011.)

[NOTE.—The election being thrown into the House, balloting began February 11, 1801, and continued until the 17th, when Jefferson received the votes of ten States and Burr those of four. (Ibid., pages 1022 to 1028. See also National Intelligencer, February 13, 16, and 18, 1801.)]

Mr. Jefferson, in a letter to James Monroe dated February 15, 1801, said:

Four days of balloting have produced not a single change of a vote. Yet it is confidently believed by most that to-morrow there is to be a coalition. I know of no foundation for this belief. * * * If they could have been permitted to pass a law for putting the Government into the hands of an officer, they would certainly have prevented an election. But we thought it best to declare openly and firmly, one and all, that the day such an act passed the Middle States would arm, and that no such usurpation, even for a single day, should be submitted to. This first shook them, and they were completely alarmed at the resource for which we declared, to wit, a convention to reorganize the Government and to amend it. The very word convention gives them the horrors, as in the present democratical spirit of America they fear they should lose some of the favorite morsels of the Constitution. Many attempts have been made to obtain terms and promises from me. I have declared to them unequivocally that I would not receive the Government on capitulation; that I would not go into it with my hands tied.—Jefferson's Works, volume 4, page 354.

The necessity of a change after the events of 1801 was apparent. The Legislature of New York proposed an amendment, which was submitted to the House by Mr. Walker, providing for a specific designation of persons voted for as President and Vice-President. (Annals, Seventh Congress, page 509.)

February 20, 1802, Mr. Stanley, of North Carolina, submitted resolutions by the Legislature of that State to the same purport. (Ibid., page 629.)

In the House, February 19, 1802, the following amendment was proposed:

That the State Legislatures shall, from time to time, divide each State into districts equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives from such State in the Congress of the United States, and shall direct the mode of choosing an elector of President and Vice-President in each of said districts, who shall be chosen by citizens having the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; and that the districts so to be constructed shall consist, as nearly as may be, of contiguous territory, and of equal proportion of population, except where there may be any detached portion of territory not of itself sufficient to form a district, which then shall be annexed to some other portion nearest thereto; which districts, when so divided, shall remain unalterable until a new census of the United States shall be taken.

SEC. 2. That, in all future elections of President and Vice-President, the persons voted for shall be particularly designated by declaring which is voted for as President and which as Vice-President.—Annals, Seventh Congress, page 602.

February 1, 1802, resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont, recommending this amendment, were submitted by Mr. Morris, of that State, to the House. (Ibid., page 472.)

The amendment proposed February 19, 1802, (the district system,) was taken up in the House May 2, and passed—yeas 47, nays 14. (Ibid., page 1,293.)

Non-concurred in by Senate—yeas 15, nays 8; two-thirds not voting in the affirmative. (Ibid., page 304.)

Renewed at second session, in the House, by Mr. Huger, of New York, and referred to the Committee of the Whole. (Ibid., second session Seventh Congress, page 449.)

October 17, 1803, John Dawson, of Virginia, in the House, proposed an amendment requiring designation of persons voted for as President and Vice-President. Referred. (Annals, first session Eighth Congress, page 372.)

2. THE TWELFTH AMENDMENT.

In the Senate, De Witt Clinton, of New York, on the 21st day of October, 1803, proposed the Twelfth Amendment. (Annals, Eighth Congress, first session, page 16.)

October 22, Mr. Butler, of South Carolina, moved an amendment that at next election no person should be eligible who had served eight years, and thereafter no person should serve as President more than four years in eight. Carried—yeas 16, nays 15.

The proposed amendment was then referred to a committee of five. (Ibid., page 21.)

After a long and acrimonious discussion, extending through the month of November, the amendment was adopted by the Senate—yeas 22, nays 10, on the 4th of December, 1803. (Ibid., page 209.)

Reported to the House December 5. (Ibid., page 642.)

Passed the House December 8—yeas 83, nays 42. (Ibid., page 775.)

Ratification proclaimed by the Secretary of State September 25, 1804. (See Hickey's Constitution, page 38.)

3. THE DISTRICT SYSTEM.

In the Senate, January 20, 1813, Mr. Turner, in pursuance of instructions from the Legislature of North Carolina, proposed an amendment providing that States should be divided into districts equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives; each district to appoint one elector by popular vote; electors to have power to fill vacancies; that districts for choosing Representatives and electors shall not be changed until new census and new apportionment. (Annals, Twelfth Congress, second session, page 57.)

Referred to select committee of seven. (Ibid., page 58.)

February 18, 1813, reported with amendments and passed—yeas 22, nays 9, without discussion. (Ibid., page 91.)

The amendment as it passed the Senate is in the following words:

That the electors of President and Vice-President of the United States shall be chosen by districts; and for that purpose each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts equal to the number of electors to which the State may be entitled. Each district shall contain, as nearly as may be, equal numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. In each district the persons qualified to vote for Representatives in the Congress of the United States shall choose one elector. The Legislature of each State shall have power to regulate the manner of holding elections and making returns of the electors chosen by the people.

In case all the electors should not meet at the time and place appointed for giving their votes, a majority of the electors met shall have power and forthwith shall proceed to supply the vacancy.

The districts for choosing electors of President and Vice-President of the United States shall not be altered in any State until an enumeration and an apportionment of Representatives shall be made subsequent to a division of the States into districts. The division of the State into districts shall take place as soon as conveniently may be after this amendment shall become a part of the Constitution of the United States, and successively afterward, whenever a new enumeration and apportionment of Representatives shall be made.—Annals, Twelfth Congress, second session, page 91.

Reported to the House February 19, 1813. Referred to Committee of the Whole. No action. (Ibid., page 1082.)

An amendment almost identical in language was submitted by Mr. Pickens, of North Carolina, in the House, January 18, 1813. (Ibid., page 848.)

Submitted again at next session by Mr. Pickens, December 20, 1813. Referred to Committee of the Whole. (Ibid., Thirteenth Congress, first session, page 797.)

ARGUMENTS IN SUPPORT OF THE RESOLUTION.

By Mr. Pickens, in the House, January 3, 1814:

The object is to establish a uniform mode of choosing electors of President and Vice-President; and that mode to be by the free, fair, and direct vote of the people in the districts, qualifying the right of suffrage by the same rules which the States have prescribed for the choice of Representatives. * * * This will secure a just equality in the relative weight of the States. * * * If by this rule any State will gain or lose in relation to its present comparative weight, it will lose only what in justice it ought. It illy comports with the dignity or real interests of the great Confederacy to suffer this struggling among the States for advantage over each other.

He then pointed out how, under the operation of the second clause of section 1, article 2 of the Constitution, State Legislatures may deprive the people of all power of choice, and referred to the appointment of electors by the Legislature of New Jersey "at the moment when the people were about to exercise the right of voting for electors." The same had occurred in North Carolina.

Continuing, Mr. Pickens said:

In each district the candidates will be known either in person or character to the people, and they will know the interests of the people whose opinions they propose to represent, and the persons to whom they will be responsible for faithfully performing their trust. * * * If different sentiments or interests exist in any State, those sentiments or interests should in their proper proportion be put into the national scale, and the fair results of the whole will point out the true national representation. Political parties will be less sectional than on any other plan. Where each single district gives a distinct vote, the political character of the voter will not be so identified by geographical sections, but more interspersed over all sections of the country.

* * * * * * *

It is a rule of policy which applies to all public measures, and more especially to the concerns of a nation, that next to the object of acting rightly is that of rendering general satisfaction.

Elections will be best secured against intrigue and corruption where this power is exercised by the scattered freemen at large.

The proposed method will arrive the nearest at a fair equality between the relative weight of the States.

By any mode of giving an entire vote to each State the will of the majority of the people of the Union is not certain to prevail. A State however divided will give the same united vote with a State however unanimous.

A reason against any mode of giving the undivided votes of the States, of all others the most important and most affecting the vital interests of the Union, is its tendency toward a geographical severance of parties. By the principle of self-defense all the States must adopt such a mode, unless a uniform plan is established; indeed, they have nearly all so acted at the late election as to give unanimous votes, and by this means a whole section of the Union, with a small exception, voted for one individual, while the opposite section supported his opponent, and these sections are divided by regular State lines. Now, does a Chief Magistrate so elected appear to represent the whole Union? And will not a small number of repetitions of such events naturally draw the opposite parties, in looking toward their opponents, to look directly across this divisional line.

Under the district plan, he argued, there would be "a promiscuous division of sentiment extending itself over the whole nation, and not capable of being delineated by State lines or the course of rivers." (Annals, Thirteenth Congress, first session, pages 828 to 835.)

Mr. Gaston, of North Carolina, supported the resolution in a lengthy speech. After describing the union of the federative and popular principles in the existing mode of choosing a Chief Magistrate, he said:

The amendment now before us is perfectly in character with the symmetry of this plan. It oversteps none of its outlines; it alters not the ratio of electors, their duration, their mode of voting, nor the materials of which they are composed. It directs only a uniform mode of apppointing them, which practically corresponds with the views of the [federal] convention. * * * It will narrow the range of faction and diminish the scope of intrigue. The political combatants will come into the field fairly.

It is by this method that the voice of the people may be fairly expressed. There may be difference between the relative strength of minorities in any two districts, but when all the districts are taken into the computation such difference must be equalized. He who obtains the suffrage of more than half of the districts must, in all human probability, have a majority of the suffrages of the people. But how is it when each State is made to throw all its votes into one scale, however much the citizens of that State may be divided? A majority of the votes thus obtained is no evidence of the sanction of a majority of the people.

When the electors of President are chosen by States, the minority in each State is utterly without weight. * * * Let the voice of every part of the nation be heard in the appointment of the Chief Magistrate, and the minority in each State acquires an importance which insures to them respect and political freedom.

He argued further that this plan will not deprive the State governments "of a single privilege which is necessary to their support, or to the full exercise of their peculiar powers," and continuing, said:

A mode of voting which throws the entire voice of each State into the scale of its favorite candidate, though it may bring about a co-operation of State with State, in fact disunites the people and breaks them into distinct masses. Such a co-operation of State with State, far from being productive of benefit to the nation, is scarcely less to be dreaded than the array of State against State. The opposition of individuals is harmless, and their union most salutary.—Annals, Thirteenth Congress, first session, pages 835-843.

The vote, January 4, 1814, in Committee of the Whole House on adopting the resolution was—yeas 57, nays 70. (Ibid., page 849.)

The vote in the House, January 31, 1814, on concurring with the

The same proposition again introduced by Mr. Pickens at the next session—March 6, 1816. (Annals, Fourteenth Congress, first session, page 1150.)

Same amendment submitted again by Mr. Pickens at next session, December 11, 1816. (Ibid., second session, page 256.)

December 17 Mr. Pickens, in Committee of the Whole, made another argument in support of the resolution. He insisted that it proposed to ingraft no new principle into the Constitution:

The objection, therefore, which is urged by some, that the features of our Government should not be altered will not apply to the proposed amendment, inasmuch as it embraces no new feature, and fixes upon a uniform rule, rendering it unalterable by the varying views of the States and the changes of factions and times.—Annals, Fourteenth Congress, second session, page 301.

He argued further that the federative principle would not be decreased by this plan, "as there is no alteration in the distribution or number of electors." (Ibid., page 305.)

Mr. Root, of New York, repeated the arguments of the opposition, which were, in brief, that the proposed amendment destroyed the federative principle, and invaded the rights of the States.

Mr. Hammond, of New York, followed in support of the resolution. He insisted that it "would increase the value of the electoral franchise." He was willing that—

The influence of the great States in their corporate capacity in the election of a President should be diminished. * * * If the people are not their own worst enemies let your electors be created immediately by and come directly from the people. When you do that, and not until then, you will be certain that your President holds his office by the consent and at the request of a majority of the people over whom he presides.—Annals, Fourteenth Congress, second session, pages 306-10.

John C. Calhoun, then a member of the House, in the course of his argument declared that—

The proposed amendment, if adopted, would remove evils which experience has shown to exist, and which in future time, if uncorrected, may menace the existence of the Republic.—Ibid., page 311.

Discussion was renewed in the House December 18.

John Randolph, of Virginia, opposed the resolution on the ground that, in his judgment, "it contemplated an abridgment of the powers of the States;" declaring at the same time that the existing mode "was a mockery—a shadow of a shade." (Ibid., page 324.)

Robert Wright, of Maryland, supported the resolution. He argued that "the adoption of this amendment will produce uniformity in the mode and stability in its duration." (Annals, Fourteenth Congress, second session, page 326.)

There was then some discussion on an amendment proposed by Mr. Jewett, of Vermont, that TWO electors be chosen by the State Legislatures, as these two would represent the independent sovereignty of the State, while the other electors would represent population in proportion to numbers, or, in other words, the popular principle. (Ibid., page 329.)

Mr. Gaston, of North Carolina, was inclined to favor the latter proposition, but would support the original resolution. After referring to the fact that the Legislatures of New York, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, Massachusetts, and Virginia had each sanctioned and recommended the adoption of the Pickens amendment, he argued that it affects the power of the States only by narrowing their discretion as to the mode of appointing electors. It does not deprive them of any beneficial power, "or of any power available to them by way of securing an equilibrium against Federal authority. The fact is, it only takes away from them a matter of detail and regulation, onerous in itself, furnishing the materials for factious intrigue and maneuver, and productive of no advantage to the States." "If the proposed amendment should communicate some additional power to the smaller States, it would be but to restore the ratio fixed by the original compact." (Ibid., page 333–36.)

Mr. Benjamin Huger, of South Carolina, argued that both the Federal and popular principles are preserved intact by the Pickens amendment. (Ibid., page 342.)

It involved the immediate agency of the people in choosing the President, and yet left the power of the States unimpaired. Each State would have two additional electors for the two Senators. Continuing, he said:

One great and important object would be obtained. All danger from geographical divisions and jealousies on the approach of an election would be done away. Not only all the different interests of each State but all the various and complicated interests scattered throughout the vast extent of the whole United States would have a full and efficient voice in the election of the Executive. The East, the West, the North, and the South would each have its proportionate influence in the election; and no one or two geographical portions or divisions of the Union, by combination, intrigue, or otherwise, would be enabled to overwhelm the others. The Chief Magistrate would consequently be, as was intended, emphatically the choice of the whole people and of all the different interests throughout the Union, elected by the people in conformity to the ratio established upon the Federal and popular principles ingrafted on the Constitution.—Annals, Fourteenth Congress, second session, pages 345, 346.

The Pickens amendment was adopted in Committee of the Whole December 20, 1816—yeas 87, nays 51. Reported to the House and laid on the table. (Ibid., pages 355, 356.)

On the 21st of January, 1817, Mr. Pickens submitted resolutions of the South Carolina Legislature urging the adoption of his amendment. (Ibid., page 694.)

Mahlon Dickerson, Senator from New Jersey, in obedience to instructions from the Legislature of that State, submitted a proposed amendment, December 23, 1817, similar to the Pickens amendment, except that two electors should be appointed by each State in such manner as the Legislature might direct. (Annals, Fifteenth Congress, first session, pages 65–136.)

Called up February 11, and elaborately discussed by Senator Dickerson, who said:

I will venture to predict that whenever the dissolution of our present form of Government shall take place, it will be in consequence of a failure to come at a just expression of the public will in the choice of a President.—Ibid., page 179.

He argued that it is "an inadmissible construction of section 1 of article 2 of the Constitution that the Legislatures of the States shall direct how they themselves shall appoint electors;" that if such practice is "an infringement of the Constitution, of which it will hardly be denied there is a well-founded doubt, then it is highly expedient that the constitutional remedy of amendment be applied."

He insisted that it had been the aim in some of the large States "to secure to the dominant party an undue influence by suppressing the voice of the minority. This system of defeating every purpose of a fair election has become an art and a science, and is known by the technical term of gerrymandering." (Ibid., page 181.)

Mr. Dickerson then reverted to the action of the Legislature of Pennsylvania in 1801, and that of New Jersey in 1808, to show how uncertain the existing system is in its operation and how liable to abuse. Continuing, he said:

The probable result of the votes of all the districts, where numerous, would be as fair an expression of the public will as can be possibly obtained unless we resort to a general vote of the people at large.—Ibid., page 184.

Perhaps the larger States will feel a reluctance to adopt a measure which will in some degree curtail their power of forming combinations with each other, and thus controlling their sister States; but the very disposition thus to combine and control is a dangerous and tyrannical principle, and if attempted would lead to counter combinations on the part of the middle size and smaller States. * * * Their combinations and their collisions are about equally to be dreaded. * * * There is great simplicity in the plan of single districts; they are but little subject to confusion and mistakes, and as they are to be modeled but once in ten years, there will be but little difficulty in their arrangement. * * * The present amendment, if adopted, introduces no new principle into the Constitution. * * * It does not abridge the just rights of any State, but adds to the security of all. * * * It will suppress those extensive and dangerous intrigues which agitate the Union at the approach of every presidential election.—Annals, Fifteenth Congress, first session, page 185.

The amendment was read a third time and negatived—yeas 20, nays 13; two-thirds not voting therefor. (Ibid., page 242.)

Its passage recommended by the Legislature of North Carolina. (Ibid., page 114.)

Connecticut recommends its passage. (Ibid., page 42.)

Mr. Dickerson, January 13, 1819, again advocated his amendment in a speech of great length, in which he said:

This plan of dividing the States into districts is no new experiment; it is no innovation whatever upon the Constitution; it is only calculated to render permanent and uniform a regulation which has prevailed in nearly all the States, and which ought to have prevailed in all and would have prevailed in all but for the disorganizing spirit of party. Whatever mode may be adopted, it is universally allowed that it ought to be uniform throughout the United States.—Ibid., page 139.

The district plan insures "that the President shall be elected by a majority and never by a minority of the people," and "will place insuperable barriers to the intrigues of ambitious individuals, who will hereafter agitate the Union at the approach of every presidential election. In the process of electing a President there ought to be more uniformity, more precision, and more certainty than in the election of any other officer; and yet, strange as it may appear, there is less." (Annals, Fifteenth Congress, second session, page 142.)

He argued that the variable, vague, and uncertain mode now in practice is more subject to abuse than that which obtains in choosing the meanest officer in the community, and continued:

And as to any effectual control of the Executive, (in case he be ambitious,) that must depend, as it heretofore has done, rather upon the virtues of the individual exercising the office than upon any positive regulations contained in the Constitution. The broad road to monarchy is left open—encumbered, indeed, with obstructions, but such as will easily yield to the pressure of ambition.—Ibid., page 146.

Great as the danger is that some ambitious individual may gain the presidential chair against the will of a large majority of the people, the subject presents itself in another point of view not less interesting. I mean the operation of our system to enable an ambitious President to perpetuate his power and to transmit it to his posterity.—Ibid., page 147.

Let us suppose that at some future period we shall have a President of forty years of age, of great talents, unbounded ambition, and an insatiable thirst of power. The period of eight years would elapse at about the period of life when ambition takes the firmest hold of the human mind. He would easily persuade himself that the public interests would suffer by his retiring from office. The great facility of securing a re-election under our system would be a temptation not to be resisted; and the host of choice spirits by whom he would be surrounded would certainly succeed in persuading him to bear the weight of government for another period and another and another to the end of his life. Suppose this President to have a son of talents and ambition like his own and of a suitable age to become his successor. The transmission of power from father to son would excite no unusual apprehension. His election would be a mere matter of form, and our Government would quietly sink into an hereditary monarchy; after which a Tiberius, Caligula, or Claudius might reign uncontrolled in America. These are not mere illusions, mere phantoms of the brain.

He then pictured the dangers which might have resulted if the House, in 1801, had chosen Burr instead of Jefferson. "He would eagerly have seized upon the reins of government." With his great military talent, with the Treasury and Army at his back, "and his talents for intrigue, which have never been overrated and rarely equaled in any country, would he not have been able to secure a re-election, and another, and another, to the end of his life?" "And would he have dared to relinquish a power which he had held by force and fraud in spite of the will of a great majority of the people?" (Ibid., pages 347, 348.)

Mr. Dickerson then took a prophetic view of the future:

Sir, the time may come when our country will be filled with an army of pensioners, always the friends of arbitrary power. The time will come when we shall have a numerous host of officers, civil and military, in every department of the Government, spread over our immense territory, looking up to the President as the source of power and emoluments. The time will come when luxury and extravagance will banish from our country every species of republican virtue; and the time will come, I fear, when this Senate will be no more than the shadow of what it was intended to be by those who framed our Constitution; when it will be no check upon the Executive; when it shall be as insignificant as the boasted senate of Rome in the time of Tiberius. The whole patronage of Government will center in the President, and that patronage, under our present system of choosing electors, will become a machine of irresistible power. The management of this power will become a matter of science. He will be deemed the greatest politician and the ablest minister who can, with a given portion of patronage, produce the greatest effect. The force of this power will be applied to effect the purposes of ambition, with as much economy and skill as water is applied to the wheel, or that of steam to the engine. It would be difficult to devise a plan better calculated to accelerate the approach of those deplorable events, or to promote the views of an ambitious President, than the present system of choosing electors.—Annals, Fifteenth Congress, second session, page 149.

James Barbour, of Virginia, opposed the amendment on the ground, as he expressed it, of "the gross inequality of its effects against the large and in favor of the smaller States," and its tendency to nationalism, "by abridging the power of the States." (Ibid., page 151.)

Vote on engrossment and third reading—yeas 28, nays 11. (Ibid., page 159.)

February 4, 1819, the proposed amendment passed the Senate by the necessary two-thirds—yeas 28, nays 10. (Ibid., page 207.)

Reported to the House February 5. (Ibid., page 1038.)

Laid on the table, February 26, by a vote of 79 yeas, 73 nays. (Ibid., page 1420.)

Senator Dickerson submitted his amendment again at the next session, December 14, 1819. (Annals, Sixteenth Congress, first session, page 22.)

Reported back without amendment. (Ibid., page 40.)

Passed by the necessary two-thirds majority January 27, 1820—yeas 29, nays 13. (Ibid., page 278.)

Reported to the House January 28. (Ibid., page 991.)

Agreed to in Committee of the Whole, reported to the House, and ordered to lie on the table, March 28. (Ibid., page 1691.)

James S. Smith, of North Carolina, moved that the House proceed to consider the resolution and argued at length in support of it. He insisted that under the district plan "the States would not be deprived of any just power. The federative principle is still preserved. By this plan you will bring the election near to the people, and, consequently, you will make them place more value on the elective franchise, which is all important in a republican form of government."

Mr. Smith's motion was rejected. (Ibid., page 1912.)

Mr. Dickerson again submitted his proposed amendment at the next session, November 22, 1820. (Annals, Sixteenth Congress, second session, page 22.)

Mr. Smith, of North Carolina, in the House, November 20, 1820, submitted an amendment exactly in the words of the Dickerson resolution. Referred to the Committee of the Whole. (Ibid., page 444.)

The vote in Committee of the Whole, December 5, 1820, on the engrossment and third reading was—yeas 103, nays 59. (Ibid., page 504.)

January 25, 1821, the resolution being before the House on its final passage, Ezra C. Gross, of New York, spoke at length in its favor. He argued that the permanent interests of the Union demanded the adoption of the proposed amendment:

Other gentlemen thought they foresaw great evils. All their arguments [against the resolution] were directed to the same point and were of three kinds: those drawn from the sacred character of the instrument and the danger of rash amendments; those addressed to the pride and jealousy of States; and, lastly, those which result from an inquiry into the present practices of different States in choosing electors. (Ibid., page 960.)

Noticing the objection that the proposed amendment would change the relative power of the large and small States, Mr. Gross remarked that he came from a great State, and continued:

What advantage will this kind of greatness be to her should jealousies be excited and discord prevail? It is a proposition that will not be controverted on this floor that the greatness of every State depends on the preservation and harmony of the Union. Why should we, under the pretense of preserving State rights, seek an unnatural advantage, the exercise of which can only serve to cherish faction, foment discord within, excite jealousy without, and jeopardize the best interests of the country? It is enough that the Constitution guarantees to us the advantage of the superiority of numbers by giving us a proportionate superiority of votes. It is a miserable ambition that seeks the temporary disfranchisement of a great minority of our fellow-citizens for the purpose of showing our power to a smaller member of the confederacy.

Uniformity and permanency in the mode of appointing electors is of more consequence than the mode itself.—Ibid., page 962.

Touching executive influence on elections he said:

In my opinion the amendment proposed will, instead of increasing the influence of the Executive, curtail it in a salutary manner. * * * It is not at the polls that this kind of influence is most to be dreaded. A whole community is not to be bribed.

In conclusion he said:

I feel bound to support the amendment as well on the broad principles of justice as to secure the constitutional independence of the States and the preservation of the Union.—Ibid., pages 963, 964.

The vote on the passage of the resolution was—yeas 92, nays 54; two-thirds not voting in the affirmative. (Ibid., page 967.)

Senator Dickerson renewed his proposition at the next session, December 19, 1821. (Annals, Seventeenth Congress, first session, page 33.

Ordered to third reading—yeas 27, nays 12. (Ibid., page 281.)

Passed the Senate, March 11, 1822, by a decisive vote—yeas 29 nays 11. (Ibid., page 283.)

Thomas H. Benton, Senator from Missouri, on the 11th of December, 1823, proposed the following:

That, for the purpose of electing a President and Vice-President of the United States, each State shall be divided by the Legislature thereof into a number of districts, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in the Congress; each district shall be composed of contiguous territory, and shall contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of persons entitled by the Constitution to be represented, and on such days as Congress shall determine, which days shall be the same throughout the United States, the citizens of each State who may be qualified to vote for a Representative in Congress shall meet at such place within their respective districts as the Legislature of each State shall appoint; and each, in his proper person, shall vote for President and Vice-President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with himself; and separate, triplicate lists shall be kept of all the voters, and of all the votes given for each person as President, and for each as Vice-President.

All the votes so given in each district shall be collected forthwith, in such manner as the Legislature of the State may direct, at some one convenient place within the district; and the votes given for each candidate shall be added together, and the person having the greatest number of votes for President and the one having the greatest number of votes for Vice-President shall be certified as duly preferred in said district, and shall be entitled to one vote each for the respective offices for which they are candidates; but if two or more persons shall have an equal number of votes in such district election for the same office, then the returning officers shall decide between them and certify accordingly.

Triplicate certificates of the whole number of votes given for each candidate shall be made out and transmitted, in such manner as Congress may direct, to the seat of Government of the United States, addressed to the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President, if such number be equal to a majority of the whole number of electoral votes within the United States; and if no person have such majority, then the President shall be chosen by the House of Representatives from the three having the greatest number of votes for President, in the manner now prescribed by the Constitution.

The person having the greatest number of votes for Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be equal to a majority of the whole number of electoral districts; and if no person have such majority, then the Vice-President shall be chosen by the Senate from the two persons having the greatest number of votes for that office, in the manner now prescribed by the Constitution.—Annals Eighteenth Congress, first session, page 32.

Senator Dickerson, of New Jersey, on the 16th of December, 1823, renewed his amendment with the added provisions:

First. That when there is no choice by the electors the two Houses by joint ballot shall elect; a majority of members present being necessary to a choice on the first ballot, and a plurality after the first.

Second. That no person having been twice elected President shall again be eligible. (Annals, Eighteenth Congress, first session, page 43.)

All resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution were referred to a select committee of five—(Benton, Hayne, Dickerson, Holmes of Maine, and Kelly.) (Ibid., page 41.)

In the Senate, December 29, 1823, Martin Van Buren, of New York, offered an amendment providing for election by districts, equal in number to Senators and Representatives to which a State is entitled, to be formed by the State Legislatures. Citizens qualified to vote for members of the lower house of the State Legislature to chose one elector in each district; electors when met to fill vacancies; Congress to fix time of chosing electors and day for giving their votes, which shall be the same throughout the United States; State Legislatures to have exclusive authority to form districts, "to direct the election to be held, to prescribe the manner thereof, except as to time of holding the same and the qualifications of the voters and the place of meeting of the electors. If no person have a majority of electors chosen, the President, by proclamation, shall reconvene the electors, who shall ballot again for President, and if no choice is made the House of Representatives shall elect as now provided by the Constitution." (Ibid., page 73.)

Mr. Benton, January 8, 1823, reported from the select committee an amendment similar to the Dickerson resolution of the previous session, except that the number of districts should be equal to the number of Senators and Representatives; that in case of no choice by electors, the two Houses of Congress, jointly, by ballot, shall elect from the three highest on the list; a majority of members present necessary to a choice on first ballot, and a plurality only afterward; the Senate to choose Vice-President when no choice is made by electors; that no person shall be again eligible after having been twice elected President. (Ibid., page 101.)

On the 15th of January, Mr. Benton offered his amendment as a substitute for the above. Agreed to. (Ibid., page 106.)

The resolution relating to the ineligibility of the President after his second term, having been separated from the other, was debated at length by Mr. Dickerson and others, and passed—yeas 36, nays 3. (Ibid., page 160.)

February 3, 1823, the order of the day being the Benton resolution as a substitute for that reported by the select committee, Mr. Benton supported his amendment in a lengthy argument. He said that experience was the only infallible test of good or bad institutions; that time had shown the defects in our electoral system; and that the framers of the Constitution, "despising the arrogance of an overweening confidence in their own work," had "provided a remedy by providing the means of amendment." (Ibid., page 167.)

After showing how, under the present system, electors had been chosen by districts, by legislative ballots, and by general ticket, he argued that "such deviations imply a great fault in the Constitution itself."

> The evil of a want of uniformity in the choice of electors is not limited to its disfiguring effect upon the face of our government, but goes to endanger the rights of the people by permitting sudden alterations on the eve of an election, and to annihilate the right of the small States by enabling the larger ones to combine and to throw all their votes into the scale of a popular candidate. These obvious evils make it certain that any uniform rule would be preferable to the present state of things. But in fixing a rule it is the duty of statesmen to select that which is calculated to give to every portion of the Union its due share in the choice of a Chief Magistrate, and to every individual a fair opportunity of voting according to his will. This would be effected by adopting the district system. It would divide every State into districts equal to the whole number of votes to be given, and the people of each district would be governed by its own majority, and not by a majority existing in some remote part of the State. This would be agreeable to the rights of individuals; for, in entering into society and submitting to be bound by the decision of the majority, each individual retained the right of being governed by a majority of the vicinage, and not by majorities brought from remote sections to overwhelm him with their accumulated numbers.
> It would be agreeable to the interests of all parts of the States, for each State may have different interests in different parts. One part may be agricultural, another manufacturing, another commercial; and it would be unjust that the strongest should govern or that two should combine and sacrifice a third.
> The district system would be agreeable to the intention of our present Constitution, which, in giving each elector a separate vote instead of giving each State a consolidated vote, composed of all its electoral suffrages, clearly intended that each mass of persons entitled to one elector should have the right of giving one vote according to their own sense of their own interests.
> The general ticket system, now existing in ten States, was the offspring of policy and not of any disposition to give fair play to the will of the people. It was adopted by the leading men of those States to enable them to consolidate the vote of the State. It would be easy to prove this by referring to facts of historical notoriety. It contributes to give power and consequence to leaders who manage the elections, but it is a departure from the intention of the Constitution, violates the rights of minorities, and is attended with many other evils. The intention of the Constitution is violated, because it was the intention of that instrument to give to each mass of persons entitled to one elector the power of giving that electoral vote to any candidate they preferred. The rights of minorities are violated, because a majority of one will carry the vote of the whole State.
> In New York thirty-six electors are chosen; nineteen is a majority, and the candidate receiving this majority is fairly entitled to nineteen votes; but he counts in reality thirty-six; because the minority of seventeen are added to the majority. These seventeen votes belong to seventeen masses of people, of 40,000 souls each, in all 680,000 people, whose votes are seized upon, taken away, and presented to whom the majority pleases.—Ibid., pages 169, 170.

Continuing, Mr. Benton said:

> I would be unwilling to use a harsh epithet, but I consider this case as amounting to an impressment of civil rights, more dangerous to our liberties than the impressment of our bodies by British ships of war.
> A further mischief of the general ticket system is, in segregating the States, drawing them up against one another, like hostile ships in battle. Out of this system has sprung the anti-social words of modern invention—"effective votes," "operative votes,"—as if the States were contending with Turks or Russians. This alienates the States from each other, and fills them with hostile feelings; and the President elected must become the President of the States which chose him, and look with coldness and resentment upon those which opposed him.—Ibid., page 170.

After quoting from the Constitution the words "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors," &c., Mr. Benton argued that "State" and "Legislature" are not synonymous terms. The word "State" embraces people, territory, and sovereignty. "When the State is to do a thing the people are to do it. A legislative body is not competent to act, because it is not the State, but a department of it." Otherwise "there would be no State when the Legislature was not in session." "The question now to be decided turns upon the appointing power of the State and the dictatorial power of the Legislature." He argued further that the word "appoint" in the clause above quoted is synonymous with "elect," and insisted that the Constitution empowered the Legislature to direct how or in what manner—as to the mode of conducting the election, taking the votes, certifying returns, &c.—the people should elect. A legislative body may direct the people how to go through the forms of an election; but a legislative body cannot direct itself. The word direct "implies an address to a third party and not to one's self." (Ibid., page 172.)

> Mr. Madison says "The people choose the electors." The Federalist says the same thing in twenty places. It describes the electors as "men chosen by the people" for the special purpose of choosing the President. It describes them as "a small number of persons selected by their fellow-citizens from the general mass." It says the Constitution has "referred the election of the President, in the first instance, to the immediate act of the American people, to be exerted in the choice of persons for the temporary and sole purpose of making the appointment." "All of which shows," said Mr. Benton, "that legislative bodies were not intended to choose electors, much less to erect themselves into electoral colleges."—Ibid., pages 172-173.

Mr. Benton then discussed the necessity of discontinuing the use of an intermediate body of electors:

> Every reason which induced the convention to institute electors has failed. They are no longer of any use, and may be dangerous to the liberties of the people. They are not useful because they have no power over their own vote, and because the people can vote for President as easily as they can vote for an elector. * * * The elector may betray the liberties of the people by selling his vote. The operation is easy, because he votes by ballot; detection is impossible, because he does not sign his vote; the restraint is nothing but his own conscience, for there is no legal punishment for his breach of trust. * * * If an elector should defraud 40,000 people out of their vote, there is no remedy but to abuse him in the newspapers.
> "Electors are nothing but agents in a case which requires no agent; and no prudent man would or ought to employ an agent to take care of his money, his property, or his liberty when he is equally capable to take care of them himself."
> He argued further that this system "gives a false direction to the gratitude of the President elected. He feels himself indebted to the electors, and not to the people who gave their votes to the electors."—Ibid., pages 178-179.

This joint resolution in proposing a direct vote of the people, Mr. Benton contended, embraced no new project:

> It was presented and discussed in the Federal Convention of 1787, was twice put to the vote and supported by the States of Pennsylvania and Delaware. * * * I feel myself treading upon safe ground when I can say to the American people, "I am endeavoring to carry into effect the plan of Benjamin Franklin and the eminent statesmen whose names have just been read" [Jared Ingersoll, Gouverneur Morris, James Wilson, Robert Morris, and others.]—Ibid., page 181.

He then argued that while the electoral colleges may be corrupted, the people at large cannot be. The corrupting influences of patronage, with all its temptations, "would become insignificant when scattered and dispersed among the millions of people which fill the Republic." (Ibid., page 184.)

Mr. Benton closed his argument by insisting that the umpirage of the House of Representatives ought to be continued in cases where there is no choice by districts.

> But the House have no power to elect a President. They have no elective faculty, no power of choice; they are limited to the humble occupation of one out of three, each of whom may be obnoxious to them. They are nothing but arbitrators, referred to as mutual friends to settle a question of mutual interest.—Ibid., page 192.

After a long discussion, covering all the proposed amendments, the whole subject was indefinitely postponed, March 22, 1824—yeas 30, nays 13. (Ibid., page 417.)

December 5, 1823, a select committee of seven was raised in the House to inquire into the expediency of recommending an amendment providing for a uniform mode of electing President and Vice-President; and, also, that the election shall, in no event, devolve on the House of Representatives. (Ibid., page 801.)

December 22, the committee, through George McDuffie, of South Carolina, submitted an elaborate report in favor of the district system, accompanied with a proposed amendment to that effect. (Ibid., pages 850 to 866.)

The McDuffie amendment proposed to divide the States into districts equal to the number of Representatives in Congress, each district to elect one elector, the electors when met to choose two additional electors. In case the electors make no choice, the Senate and House, by joint ballot, shall elect, the members voting individually and not by States.

Edward Livingston, of Louisiana, in the House, January 24, 1824, proposed an amendment providing for the choice of electors by districts. In case no choice be made, the electors shall be reconvened by the President, and shall choose from the two having the highest number of votes. (Ibid., page 1179.)

On the 19th January, 1826, Mr. Benton made an elaborate report from the select committee of nine accompanied by a proposed amendment.

The select committee had carefully considered all the plans proposed at previous sessions of Congress, and the joint resolution accompanying their report was the one which seemed best calculated to insure uniformity, certainty, and safety in the choice of a Chief Magistrate.

The committee in their report insist that the intention of the Constitution has wholly failed in two leading features, namely, "the institution of electors, and the ultimate election by States in the House of Representatives;" and they propose:

> First. That a uniform mode of election by districts shall be established.
> Second. That the institution of electors shall be abolished, and the President and Vice-President hereafter elected by a direct vote of the people.
> Third. That a second election, to be conducted in the same manner as the first, shall take place between the persons having the two highest numbers, for the same office, when no one has received a majority of the whole number of votes given.

For Mr. Benton's report in full see Senate Report No. 22, first session Nineteenth Congress.

Debated by Benton, Johnson of Kentucky, Macon, and Branch for, and by Dickerson and Van Buren against; the negative arguments being directed mainly against a second election by the people. (Congressional Debates, volume 2, part 1, pages 692-696.)

Mr. McDuffie, of South Carolina, in the House, December 9, 1825, moved that a select committee be appointed, with instructions to prepare and report an amendment providing for a uniform election by districts, and to prevent the election from devolving on the House. (Ibid., page 797.)

Called up and debated February 15, 1826.

Mr. McDuffie argued that "the Constitution, by declaring that each State shall appoint electors in such manner as the Legislature may direct,' puts an unequivocal negative upon the idea of fixedness and permanence, which essentially enter into the notion of constitutional regulation." (Ibid., page 1367.)

He then combated the idea that the district system would tend to destroy the sovereignty of the States, or produce what is termed consolidation.

What do gentlemen mean by consolidation? That consolidation which is really dangerous to liberty, and which would destroy the federative character of our Government, is the concentration of power in the Government here. In this sense of the term I deprecate consolidation as much as any man, and the tendency of my proposition is to produce a result precisely the reverse of this. Instead of concentrating power in the hands of the Government here, it diffuses the most important of all powers among the great body of the people, and fixes it there irrevocably.

How can it be conceived that we impair the rights of a State by vesting the highest prerogative of sovereignty in the people of that State? Virginia, voting by districts, is Virginia still, divested of none of her attributes as a separate member of the confederacy.—Ibid., pages 1374, 1375.

He contended that the tendency of the district system would be to restrain the power of the Executive.

There is no power more active, encroaching, and dangerous, operating as it does through the influence of its patronage, upon the hopes and fears of a large portion of the community. But, by rendering the President directly responsible to the people, we shall solve the great problem, never before fully realized, of uniting in the government of so extensive a country the elements of liberty and power.—Ibid., page 1378.

In arguing in favor of dispensing with an intermediate body of electors, Mr. McDuffie said the people were as competent to vote for President as for middlemen. The present electoral system, "in a word, combines the disadvantages of both modes of election, and the advantage of neither," and in the ultimate choice by the House it gives the House "just sufficient latitude for all purposes of corruption, and not enough for any good end." (Ibid., pages 1387, 1388.)

Mr. McDuffie concluded by arguing against an ultimate choice by the House, on the general ground that such an election is violative of the true principles of the mixed federal and popular system of government intended by the framers of the Constitution, and of the rights of the people. (Ibid., pages 1388–1395.)

After a very lengthy discussion, a vote was taken on Mr. McDuffie's resolutions. First, the proposition to amend the Constitution by taking the election out of Congress was adopted—yeas 138, nays 52; second, for the district system the vote stood—yeas 90, nays 102. The first resolution was then referred to a select committee of twenty-four. (Ibid., part 2, volume 2, pages 2004, 2005.)

Mr. Benton again introduced his proposed amendment, December 9, 1833. (Congressional Debates, volume 10, part 1, page 20.)

The committee reported June 11, 1834, the same amendment which accompanied Mr. Benton's report, made at the first session, Nineteenth Congress. Laid on the table. (Ibid., pages 1954–1958.)

Called up at next session, January 15, 1835, by Mr. Benton. Briefly discussed and laid on the table. (Ibid., volume 12, part 1, pages 216, 217.)

William Allen, of Ohio, proposed an amendment in the Senate December 14, 1837, similar to the Benton resolution. (Globe, second session Twenty-fifth Congress, page 25.)

Referred to select committee of nine, (Allen, Wright, Calhoun, Webster, Benton, Rives, Crittenden, and Clayton.) (Ibid., page 63.)

Mr. Benton again submitted his amendment January 15, 1844, and supported the same by a speech in which he rehearsed the arguments made in his speech in 1824, and subsequent report. (Globe, first session Twenty-eighth Congress, pages 686, 687.)

Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, in the House, on the 21st of February, 1851, proposed the Benton amendment so modified that when the election has been held by the people a second time, two or more persons having received "the greatest and an equal number of votes, the person having the greatest number of votes in the greatest number of States shall be President." The same rule as to Vice-President, except that when a second election of President is not necessary and there has been no choice of Vice-President the Senate shall choose a Vice-President from the two highest on the list. (Globe, first session Thirty-first Congress, page 627.)

Mr. Johnson again brought in his resolution February 2, 1852. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. (Globe, first session Thirty-second Congress, page 443.)

January 18, 1854, the House appointed a select committee of nine, to join such committe as the Senate may appoint, "to whom shall be referred such resolutions proposing to amend the Constitution in the mode of electing the President and Vice-President of the United States, with instructions to take that matter and the subject generally into consideration, and to report upon the same in such manner as to them may seem most expedient." (Globe, first session Thirty-third Congress, page 202.)

January 30, the Senate appointed a committee of five to meet the above House committee. (Ibid., page 275.)

In the Senate, December 13, 1860, Andrew Johnson again submitted his proposed amendment. (Globe, second session Thirty-sixth Congress, page 82.)

December 18, Mr. Johnson called up his joint resolution and supported it in a speech of some length. He argued that the troubles then impending would have been averted if the presidential election of 1860 had been held in the manner provided in his amendment. (Ibid., page 117.) A long debate followed, participated in by Benjamin, Baker, Hale, and others; but the discussion was shifted to a general view of the question of secession, and the power of the General Government to coerce the States. (Ibid., pages 139–238.)

Rufus P. Spalding, of Ohio, in the House, February 1, 1869, introduced a joint resolution proposing an election by districts, "the time, place, and manner of holding the same to be prescribed by Congress." Referred to Committee on Revision of Laws. (Globe, Fortieth Congress, third session, page 768.)

Mr. Sumner, of Massachusetts, offered an amendment in the Senate, May 30, 1872, providing for the election of President by the direct vote of the people in all the States and Territories. Election to be held on the 1st Monday in April. A majority of the total vote necessary to a choice at first election. If the two Houses of Congress, in joint convention on third Monday in May, find that no candidate have such majority, a second election shall be held, when a plurality shall elect. Second election to take place on second Tuesday in October following.

In case of death or removal of President, the head of an Executive Department, senior in years, shall be the President. If Congress be in session at death or removal of President, the two Houses in joint session shall choose a President viva voce, each Senator and Representative having one vote; a quorum to consist of a majority of each House, and a majority present being necessary to a choice. If Congress be not in session, the acting President shall call extra session to elect President. The office of Vice-President to be abolished, and Senate to choose its own presiding officer. Presidency to be limited to a single term of four years. (Globe, Forty-second Congress, second session, page 4036.)

For Mr. Sumner's joint resolution in full, see Bills and Resolutions, Senate United States, 1872–73, part 8, Senate resolution No. 7, second session, Forty-second Congress.

Again brought forward by Mr. Sumner at next session, January 16, 1873. (Globe, third session, Forty-second Congress, page 638.)

John Lynch of Maine, proposed amendment in the House January 6, 1873, for election by direct vote of the people, a majority of whole vote cast necessary to a choice. If no choice by popular vote, House to elect, voting by States. (Globe, third session, Forty-second Congress, page 353.)

Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, submitted a resolution in the Senate January 6, 1873, directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to inquire and report upon the best and most practicable mode of electing the President and Vice-President. (Ibid., page 340.)

January 13 Mr. Morton called up and discussed his resolution at length. He said that, under article 2, section 1 of the Constitution—

The appointment of electors is placed absolutely and wholly with the Legislatures of the States. They may choose by the Legislature, or the Legislature may provide that they shall be elected by the people at large, or in districts as are members of Congress, which was the case formerly in many States; and it is no doubt competent for the Legislature to authorize the governor, or the supreme court of the State, or any other agent of its will, to appoint these electors.

He then argued that although there might be the most monstrous frauds and unfairness in the choice of electors, the will of the people being entirely subverted, there is no provision of law in any State for settling a contest arising out of such election. (Ibid., page 662.)

He criticised the present system and said there was danger of revolution growing out of its defects; that if a President should be elected by the vote of a State, secured by fraudulent or unfair means, "he would in advance be shorn of moral power and authority in his office, and would be looked upon as a usurper, and the consequences that would result from such a state of things no man can predict."

He argued that the President of the Senate had exercised an uncertain and dangerous power, but combated the proposition that the framers of the Constitution intended that he should perform other than merely ministerial functions in opening certificates at the joint meeting of the two Houses. But he insisted that the exercise of judicial and discretionary powers may devolve upon him ex necessitate rei, and if he decides corruptly or in violation of the law his decision is final, and there is no remedy provided in the Constitution. (Ibid., page 663.)

He declared that "the idea of interposing an electoral body between the Chief Magistracy and the people had come down from ancient times, and had its origin in aristocratic forms of government where the nobility elected the sovereign or chief magistrate." He believed the electoral system was born of distrust in the people, as the federal convention seemed to think it unsafe to lodge such a power in their hands. He argued that the electoral system has completely failed. "The electoral colleges," he continued, "have turned out to be wholly useless. Every reason given for their original establishment has absolutely failed in practice." (Ibid., page 664.)

He preferred, he said, "that the President should be elected by the people as one community, giving the election to the man who received the highest number of votes, without regard to State lines or municipal divisions."

He was opposed to the present system because "the dangers of sectionalism" are greatly increased by it. "Under the present apportionment the electoral votes of ten States out of thirty-seven may elect a President."

But I submit to the inevitable, and assume that the smaller States will not consent to an amendment by which the President would be elected by the people of the United States as one community. Yet I believe they can have no objection to such a change as will bring the election of the President directly to the people of the several States, each State to be divided into as many districts as it has Senators and Representatives, each district to have one vote in the election of President and

Vice-President, and the vote of that district to be counted in favor of the candidates for President and Vice-President who receive the largest number of votes in it.—Ibid., page 665.

He argued further that the district system would give due weight to the smaller States, and that under the present system the sovereignty of great States has been strengthened at the expense of the small ones. (Ibid., 665.)

Mr. Morton, in the course of his speech, adopted the same line of argument in favor of the district system pursued by Benton, Dickerson, and others. (Ibid., 664, 665.)

Mr. Sumner again submitted his joint resolution at the first session Forty-third Congress. (Record, first session Forty-third Congress, page 2.)

Senator Wright, of Iowa, proposed an amendment December 15, 1874, providing for election by the direct vote of the whole people, a majority electing. If no one have a majority a second election to be held and votes cast for the two highest on the list only. Returns to be certified to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and that court to determine all questions relating to validity of returns, &c. Ineligibility after one term of six years. (Ibid., second session Forty-third Congress, page 81.)

Senator Morton reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, January 20, 1875, a joint resolution proposing an amendment providing for election by direct vote in districts. (Senate Report No. 16, second session Forty-third Congress; Record, second session Forty-third Congress, page 608.)

See, also, report of same committee submitting arguments in favor of district system. (Senate Report No. 395, first session Forty-third Congress.)

The joint resolution discussed at length by Morton, THURMAN, and CONKLING. (Ibid., pages 626 to 634, and 649 to 652.)

Senator Morton again submitted his amendment at the next session, December 5, 1876. (Record, second session Forty-fourth Congress, page 17.)

Discussed by Senators Morton and EDMUNDS. (Ibid., 123 to 127.)

I move the reference of the joint resolution to the Select Committee to take into consideration the state of the law respecting the ascertaining and declaration of the Result of the Elections of President and Vice-President of the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; and the question pending is on an appeal from the decision of the Chair on the question of order as to whether the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] is in order. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, at the end of section 1, to add:

For additional postal service to foreign countries, $1,000,000, to be expended under the direction of the Postmaster-General, in the establishment of mail steamship lines, equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican-Gulf, and Pacific ports: Provided, That the vessels employed for such service shall be owned and manned by American citizens, and that said vessels thus employed shall be iron steamships, accepted by the Secretary of the Navy, after due inspection, as in all respects seaworthy and properly fitted for such service.

Mr. WALLACE. I believe the pending question is upon the point of order made by myself, that the amendment reported by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, was legislation, and therefore not in order. The Chair decided that point of order well taken, and an appeal was taken therefrom to the Senate. I believe that is the situation of the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the amendment proposed is so very important, and it being one that should be properly matured in the Senate, I venture to submit a few observations on the question of order. The decision of the Chair yesterday was that the proposed amendment was not out of order because it increased the amount of the appropriation, and in that decision the Senate acquiesced. Then the question was raised whether the amendment was out of order under Rule 29, because it proposed general legislation.

If you can find in the statute-books general legislation covering the whole ground of this amendment, which needs only to be further regulated for the purpose of disposing properly of this appropriation of a million dollars, which is in order, then the objection raised to this proposition being in order must fall to the ground.

The Senate is considering an amendment to the bill brought in by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, proposing to appropriate $1,000,000 for the purposes of enabling the Postmaster-General to make contracts for the transportation of the mails to foreign countries and from foreign countries to this country, in lieu of the system which has been heretofore adopted by statute and which is now in force, of giving to the persons who transmit the mails the postage-money instead of mail pay in the ordinary acceptance of the term. I do not see, after it has been determined by the Senate that this proposed amendment so far far as the appropriation is concerned is in order, how it can possibly be held that the Senate shall have no power to dispose of that appropriation in such a way as to make it more valuable or more available for the purposes of mail intercommunication between this and foreign countries. Whatever shall be added now to this million dollars in the nature of a provision for the regulation of its expenditure or its employment must be germane to the subject of its expenditure; and unless it create a necessity entirely new, to the breaking down of some established and existing system for the regulation of mail intercommunication between this and foreign countries, I cannot understand how the proposed amendment is amenable to the objection which has been raised against it. Rule 29 provides that—

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

The object of that rule was not to cramp either House of Congress when it had the right to make an amendment to an appropriation bill so as to prevent either House from giving proper direction to that appropriation; but it was intended to prevent the introduction of new and substantive matters of legislation either not germane to the subject in hand or such matters of legislation as were entirely new and of a general or universal character.

The object of the rule found in the Manual was to prevent opportunity being afforded to any Senator or to any member of the House (to any Senator is as far as we need to discuss the subject here) of compelling the Senate to adopt some new provision of general law by fastening that provision upon an appropriation bill and threatening to stop the Department of the Government for which we were providing unless that general law should be adopted. That was the purpose intended to be prevented by the adoption of this rule; and when we look at the real reason of the rule we understand, I think, that a proposition which merely relates to the regulation of the manner of the expenditure of an appropriation that is held to be in order cannot be such general legislation as violates that rule in letter or in principle.

Upon turning to the Statutes of the United States on this subject I find that every provision contained in the amendment offered by the committee has been substantially made. Every provision of general law in reference to the transportation of mails to foreign countries is found substantially in the existing legislation upon that subject; but of course the special stipulations of this amendment and the special provisions in reference to the use of this $1,000,000 are not found in any law; but the convenient use, the just application of this amount of money which we are now asked to appropriate for the purpose of paying for the transmission of mails across the ocean is a subject properly within the power of the Senate to regulate upon a general appropriation bill. It is not necessary that we should go before a committee and have a separate bill passed authorizing us to establish foreign mails, because under existing laws the Postmaster-General has the power to establish foreign mails; or to fix rates of postage, because under the laws he has the power to fix rates of postage; or to declare that the mails shall be carried in steamships, for under the existing law he has the power to declare that the mails shall be carried in steamships. Every substantial provision in this amendment except the mere regulation of the method of its execution is found in the existing statutes. I will now call the attention of the Senate to some of these laws.

SEC. 4007. The Postmaster-General may, after advertising for proposals, enter into contracts for the transportation of the mail between the United States and any foreign country whenever the public interests will thereby be promoted.

There is a general law which makes the whole bosom of the ocean a mail-route, and leaves it to the Postmaster-General to select what ports of the United States the mails shall leave, and at what ports abroad they shall arrive. It is left entirely to his own discretionary declaration to designate those mail-routes which are established under this act as being common to all the ports of our country and all the ports of a foreign country, the ocean being the great way upon which the mails are to be transmitted.

I submit that if the Congress of the United States were to engage itself for a month in providing mail-routes across the ocean, it would not after all have made a system as full and as broad and as comprehensive as that which is contained in section 4007, for Congress in specifying the mail-routes would merely limit the number, whereas section 4007 places no limit on the number of routes or the ports to or from which the routes shall be established, but lays every port open to the access of the mails from abroad, and enables the Postmaster-General to send steamships out of any port of the United States to any port abroad.

Certainly, therefore, in the matter of the establishment of post-routes there is no new general legislation in the amendment; but the amendment falls within and is intended to complete and effectuate a provision of law which is now upon the statute-book. It does not undertake to create a new system or to create new mail-routes.

SEC. 4008. The mail between the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the United States touching at a foreign port, shall be transported in steamships; but the Postmaster-General may have such transportation performed by sailing-vessels when the service can be facilitated thereby.

The amendment provides that the mail shall be transported in iron steamships. Neither do the two sections that I have read nor any other sections confine the Postmaster-General to a specific manner of carrying mails abroad, but the amendment provides an additional means of carrying them abroad, which is that he shall designate the ports from which these lines are to be established, as he has the right now to do, and the mails shall be carried in iron steamships.

SEC. 4009. For transporting the mail between the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the United States touching at a foreign port, the Postmaster-General may allow as compensation, if by a United States steamship, any sum not exceeding the sea and United States inland postage; and if by a foreign steamship or by a sailing-vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea-postage, on the mail so transported.

The amendment provides simply that you may add to that, and appropriates $1,000,000, so that the Postmaster-General, instead of paying in postages under the discriminating rule as between American and foreign ships, may pay in money out of the Treasury of the United States, precisely as we pay a contractor who carries the mail over a railway or on a star route. It is the addition of $1,000,000 to the fund from which is to be drawn the support of our foreign mail intercommunication, and that is all that can be said of it.

The next section relates to the power of the Postmaster-General in imposing fines:

4010. The Postmaster-General may impose fines on contractors for transporting the mail between the United States and any foreign country for any unreasonable or unnecessary delay in the departure of such mail or the performance of the trip; but the fine for any one default shall not exceed one-half of the contract price for the trip.

"The contract price for the trip," says the statute. What is the contract price for the trip? Under the existing system you cannot exceed the amount of postage, to which I have just called the attention of the Senate; but under the amendment proposed the payment may exceed the amount of the postage, and money may be appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of adding to the contract price and thereby facilitating the carrying of the mails abroad; and as to the power of imposing fines placed in the hands of the Postmaster-General it would be just as applicable after we had passed this amendment as it is applicable to the present system of the transportation of the mails.

SEC. 4011. Every contract for transporting the mail between the United States and any foreign country shall contain, besides the usual stipulation for the right of the Postmaster-General to discontinue the same, the further stipulation that it may be terminated by Congress.

Congress maintains the power under existing laws to revoke the contract as well as to give the power to the Postmaster-General of the discontinuance of a route under which by contract the party who transported the mails is entitled to a certain remuneration. The next section provides for the transportation of mails through the United States. Here is a section in reference to offenses against foreign mails in transitu:

SEC. 4013. Every foreign mail shall, while being transported across the territory of the United States under the provisions of the preceding section, be deemed and taken to be a mail of the United States, so far as to make any violation thereof, or depredation thereon, or offense in respect thereto, or any part thereof, an offense of the same grade, and punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as though the mail was the mail of the United States.

It then provides for indictment for such offenses. The Statutes then provide as follows:

SEC. 4014. The Postmaster-General or the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to empower the consuls of the United States to pay the foreign postage on such letters destined for the United States as may be detained at the ports of foreign countries for the non-payment of postage, which postage shall be by the consul marked as paid by him, and the amount thereof shall be collected in the United States as other postage, on the delivery of the letters, and repaid to said consul, or credited on his account at the State Department.

SEC. 4015. The Postmaster-General, under the direction of the President of the United States, is hereby authorized and empowered to charge upon, and collect from, all letters and other mailable matter carried to or from any port of the United States, in any foreign packet-ship or other vessel, the same rate or rates of charge for American postage which the government to which such foreign packet or other vessel belongs imposes upon letters and other mailable matter conveyed to or from such foreign country in American packets or other vessels as the postage of such government, and at any time revoke the same; and all custom-house officers and other United States agents designated or appointed for that purpose shall enforce or carry into effect the foregoing provision, and aid or assist in the collection of such postage, and to that end it shall be lawful for such officers and agents, on suspicion of fraud, to open and examine, in the presence of two or more respectable persons, being citizens of the United States, any package or packages supposed to contain mailable matter found on board such packets or other vessels or elsewhere, and to prevent, if necessary, such packets or other vessels from entering, breaking bulk, or making clearance until such letters or other mailable matter are duly delivered into the United States post-office.

SEC. 4016. All letters or other mailable matter conveyed to or from any part of the United States by any foreign vessel, except such sealed letters, relating to such vessel, or any part of the cargo thereof, as may be directed to the owners or consignees of the vessel, shall be subject to postage charge, whether addressed to any person in the United States or elsewhere, provided they are conveyed by the packet or other ship of a foreign country imposing postage on letters or mailable matter conveyed to or from such country by any vessel of the United States.

Then it goes on to make a further proviso in that declaration. I have read these provisions of the statutes for the purpose of showing that we have now a thoroughly organized system of mail intercommunication with foreign countries, to show that there is no single track that a ship's keel can make upon the bosom of the ocean that will be restricted under the law of the United States if it is sailing from any port of the United States to any foreign port carrying the mails under a contract with this Government.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator from Alabama a question? Suppose the words were interpolated in the amendment now before the Senate, "according to the provisions of existing law," does the Senator believe that the amendment would be operative?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not, because the existing law requires——

Mr. BAYARD. Is not that the crucial test of the order or disorder of the amendment in question? If it requires a change or modification of existing law to make effective the amendment which is now proposed, then the amendment is out of order. If, on the contrary, the amendment be in accordance with existing law it probably may be considered in order. I submit to my honorable friend from Alabama that if those words were interpolated they would destroy the object and effective action of the amendment, and yet if they are not in, either to be read between the lines or to be read there openly, the amendment I think will be in violation of the rule.

Mr. MORGAN. It is almost impossible to pass any appropriation bill that does not contain some change upon some existing system. If we were compelled to adhere upon appropriation bills entirely and rigidly and closely to the existing state of the law, without modification or amendment, nothing would be left open to us but to adopt for each succeeding year the appropriation bills of the preceding year. There is not an appropriation bill that has ever passed through this body that does not contain some material modifications of existing laws. But few appropriation bills have been passed through this body which did not contain new systems of legislation grafted upon them, either such as are foreign to the subject-matter of the bill or such as are relevant to the subject-matter of the bill. It perhaps would be proper upon a bill of this kind to introduce a provision "that all laws authorizing mail intercommunication with foreign countries are hereby repealed." I say possibly so, because then we should be abrogating a system by a repealing clause in this act. It would be better, wiser, and safer that such a measure should be considered in the committee selected by the Senate to take particular charge of that business, and it is only that we are providing for ourselves rules of safety in the administration of public affairs that we have resorted to this operation of adopting such a rule at all. But when you admit the system in all of its broad and full force and power, and when you preserve in that system every feature of it entirely intact, and in making an appropriation for the support of it, in addition to appropriations under existing laws you find it necessary to make some addition to, amendment of, or modification of the system, it cannot be said that we are altering the law or changing the law in that material sense which makes it new or general legislation.

The question being raised as to the admissibility of this amendment under the rule which I have quoted, I confine my remarks at the present moment to that view of the case. I will read section 3971.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand the sections of the Revised Statutes which the Senator has read, they in substance and in effect do really establish a postal line between the ports of this country and every foreign port at which we have a consul.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, the laws of the United States authorize the Postmaster-General to have the mails carried in steamships or sailing vessels, according to his discretion, and authorize him to fix the rates of postage and make ample provision for the protection of the mail on board ships.

The laws of the United States not only protect a United States mail on board foreign ships when sailing to a foreign port, but protect that mail by legal penalties against any invasion or violation. So if any person on board the ship shall violate the mail, shall trespass upon the mail in any regard whatever, the courts of the United States have jurisdiction to punish the offense. Our system is already so far complete and perfect in this regard that we have left nothing open about it except the amount of money that we will appropriate and the manner in which we shall carry the mail. Would any Senator doubt that we have the right to use the ships of the United States Government, the naval ships that are not in commission, in the transportation of the mail if we see proper to order them to carry the mail? Yet that would be quite a change in the system; it might be regarded as an innovation; but surely we have a right to order our men-of-war to carry our mails to the port of New York, to the port of Liverpool, or elsewhere; and we have a right to do it under an appropriation bill. We have a right to save expenses, as well as the power to increase expenses.

The amendment now presented to the Senate is an arrangement for the transportation of the mails under a system already established.

It does not violate the principle of the system; it does not repeal any essential feature of it, and only adds to the efficiency of the system by providing new means of conveyance and a different mode of transportation.

Let me read further from the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 3971. The Postmaster-General may enter into contracts for extending the line of posts to supply mails to post-offices not on any established route, and, as a compensation for carrying the mail under such contracts, may allow not exceeding two-thirds of the salary paid to the postmaster at such special offices.

SEC. 3975. The Postmaster-General may, when he deems it advisable, contract for the transportation of the mails to and from any post-office; but where such service is performed over a route not established by law, he shall report the same to Congress at its meeting next thereafter, and such service shall cease at the end of the next session of Congress, unless such route is established a post-route by Congress.

Here we give to the Postmaster-General the right in a general way to establish post-routes where they do not exist, and upon which he may arrange mail service, and fix by contract or otherwise the amount of payment for the mail service, leaving it to be repealed by the succeeding Congress, or leaving it to fall if the succeeding Congress may not see proper to adopt his action in that particular.

These provisions of the statutes simply show that the Government of the United States in establishing mails, whether upon the high seas or upon the land, has given to its executive officer charged with that duty broad discretionary power, and has not undertaken to confine that discretion to routes that are already established by law.

I must confess that I have looked carefully, and so far in vain, to find what law would be repealed by this proposed amendment to this bill, or what law would be altered, except as to the method of making these contracts and paying for the transportation of the mails and the manner of their transportation. We have adopted postal cars; we have authorized the Postmaster-General to require special cars to be built expressly for the purpose of carrying the mails across this continent in one direction and another. Because we have done that, nobody, I believe, has ever complained that that was repealing any existing law, or that it was an invasion of an established system; nor can it be held that this amendment is a repeal of any existing law or the establishment of a new system. As I have remarked before, it is merely an arrangement or amendment of that system so as to make it more advantageous for the public.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I desire to offer a few observations to the Senate in regard to the proposition now pending in order to show my views upon the subject. I cannot conceive how this amendment violates the rule of the Senate to which reference has been made, which provides that—

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

There is some legislation so intimately connected with appropriations of money that it is impossible to separate them. There is legislation which does not require, in order to give it effect, any appropriation of public money. I will take the case of public buildings as an example. No one now would pretend to say that if this were the sundry civil appropriation bill instead of the Post-Office appropriation bill, and a Senator came here who had failed to persuade the committee, of which I happen to be chairman, to pass favorably upon a bill for the erection of a public building in any of the States of the Union, and offered a proposition to put the provisions of such a bill on the sundry civil bill, it would be out of order on that bill. It has never been so held, and the practice of Congress supports me in that statement. It will be found on referring to the past that numerous instances have occurred where provisions were made for the erection of public buildings on sundry civil appropriation bills, and appropriations were made to erect them.

So with regard to the Navy. Suppose we had the naval appropriation bill here, and it was thought necessary to authorize the head of that Department of the Government to build some additional ships of war different in model, style, and class from those which were recognized before, and some Senator who had at heart the interests of this country, wishing to build up this much-neglected arm of the public service, came forward with an amendment providing that the Secretary of the Navy should have placed at his disposal $1,000,000 to put the American Navy on a respectable footing, and going beyond the mere matter of appropriation, if the mover of such an amendment thought proper to designate with precision the class of ships that were to be built, would any Senator say that such an amendment would be in violation of the rule of the Senate? I think not.

Is this proposition, then, different from those that have been suggested? It is not; because the very essence of the thing is an appropriation of public money. The essence of this amendment is an appropriation. Without it you can do nothing. There is, as was stated awhile ago, some legislation that may be enacted and that may stand independent of appropriations, touching general laws; and that kind of legislation I imagine this rule was intended to prevent being incorporated into appropriation bills; but when the main object sought to be accomplished is the appropriation of public money, everything incidental to it follows the main question and is controlled by it.

To test this question, how would we proceed if we were to conform to the views entertained by the gentlemen who oppose this amendment? What course would they point out to us for accomplishing this object, if it were the sense of this body that it ought to be perfected? Would they say that it is necessary to pass an independent bill, authorizing the Postmaster-General to establish lines of mail communication between the United States and all the countries of Europe, and, after that is enacted, then to come in here with another distinct proposition to be incorporated into an appropriation bill to carry that out? The other proposition amounts to nothing by itself. You might pass fifty laws here empowering the Postmaster-General to establish lines of communication between the United States and Europe, but what would they amount to by themselves? That does not hold true, however, with respect to another description of laws which would be capable of operation and force independent of any appropriation of public money; but in this particular case the very necessities of it require that you shall couple an appropriation with the authority proposed to be given; and in a case of that kind nothing, it seems to me, is clearer than that the appropriation must control the incidents that follow it, and that they are proper to be ingrafted into an appropriation bill.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, confessing very little accurate knowledge of the rules, I have supposed there was a certain test of the fact whether an amendment to one of the general appropriation bills was in order or not. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of course have a clear right to consider any matter connected with the postal service and tender an independent bill for the passage of the measure they recommend. No one disputes that. They give it consideration; they state all the facts; they report it favorably to the Senate; they place it upon the Calendar and there it takes its chances. But they have another right, and that is, if they believe that it is a proper thing to do, and that an appropriation ought to be made for it, they can refer it to the Committee on Appropriations for its consideration, and after that committee have had an opportunity to act upon it one way or the other, it is in order to test the sense of the Senate relative to the measure that has been so submitted as an amendment to the proper appropriation bill.

In this particular case the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads did not venture to present this as an independent measure to test the sense of the Senate upon it, as they had a right to do, and they did not venture to send it to the Committee on Appropriations while the Committee on Appropriations had charge of the bill to which they now seek to attach it as an amendment. If they had seen fit so to do, as they had a perfect right to do, then the Committee on Appropriations would have had a right to call upon the head of the Post-Office Department to know whether he desired this to be done. When this question was up before, in another form, the former Postmaster-General, Judge Key, was called upon, and he distinctly answered that it was not necessary and he could not recommend it as a postal measure; and the record that was read here two years ago, when the question was up in another form, contained a letter of that Postmaster-General saying that he was getting all the postal service he wanted done for less than 10 per cent. of the amount now sought to be given him, and that it was not a postal measure, but a commercial measure.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me, I think that proposition applied to the case of Brazil.

Mr. BECK. I think it did in great part, and I think this does when you sift it down and get clear of the circumlocution about it.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator referred to the fact that the former Postmaster-General had expressed a certain opinion. That referred to the case of Brazil; and he stated that it was more of a commercial interest than a post-route. The proposition was to pay $100,000, I think, to concur with the Government of Brazil in appropriating $100,000 to a line established between this country and Rio Janeiro.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Michigan tell us what line of American-built steamships, manned and officered by Americans, we now have to which this appropriation can apply that crosses the Atlantic Ocean to any of the great countries of Europe? I should be glad to hear.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator asks for a reply, I will state that this is simply an appropriation left to the discretion of the Postmaster-General to apply to the improvement of the postal service upon the high seas to foreign countries anywhere.

Mr. BECK. But at the same time it requires that the mails shall be carried in American-built ships, manned and officered by American officers and sailors. Does not the Senator from Michigan know that there is not a single line that meets that requirement which crosses the Atlantic Ocean to any of the great countries of Europe, and that this is in fact as much a Brazilian subsidy as if it had been so called?

Mr. FERRY. I reply to the Senator in this wise: That simply applies to the form or the application of the service, no more and no less than it would be if it was proposed to compel the Postmaster-General to have the mails carried in postal cars rather than in baggage cars.

Mr. BECK. But is not the mail to be carried, by the very limitation of the amendment, over a route to Brazil which alone can meet the requirements of the proposition now made? Is there a single line anywhere, going to England, to France, to Germany, to the Mediterranean, to any of the great countries where our productions are going, that can by possibility apply?

Mr. FERRY. That is stating just what I stated before, that it is simply placing a sum of money in the hands of the Postmaster-General to be used in his discretion for the interests of the postal service between this country and foreign nations. The mere fact of confining it to iron ships does not affect the question of order. The amendment does not specify the size of the steamships, but says that they shall be owned in America and manned by American citizens. That is simply carrying out a form of application for the benefit and best interests of this Government. If the Senator contends that this is general legislation, merely providing how the mails shall be carried, then confining the carrying of the mails upon land in postal cars is as much general legislation as this would be.

Mr. BECK. I think the failure of the Senator from Michigan (who is so well posted upon all these matters) to answer the question that I put to him is a substantial confession that while the amendment is supposed to be in the form in which it is now placed more acceptable to the American people than if it had been called a subsidy given to a single gentleman for carrying the mails to Brazil, it is in fact that and nothing more, for there are no other American ships that meet the requirements of the law except those upon that single line; and instead of limiting, as was done in the bill that was defeated before, the discretion of the Postmaster-General to a given sum, it authorizes the Postmaster-General with this million of dollars to give whatever he thinks fit, because there can be no competition, and whatever is demanded must be given, and only one man can make the demand, and he is obliged to be the lowest bidder.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me, he must have misapprehended the amendment if he supposes that it is confined to American ships. It only provides that they shall be manned and owned by American citizens.

Mr. BECK. And no American citizen has any right to own, and the navigation laws prohibit him from owning, anything but an American-built ship; and if this is to begin now there can be no ship built in America within eighteen months or two years from this time to carry any of the mails that this purports to provide for.

When the question comes up, after the point of order is passed on, I may have something to say on that subject; but I desire to say now that if the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads desire to make this a proper amendment to a bill laid before the Senate by the Committee on Appropriations under the rule, on every consideration of fair play the Committee on Appropriations ought to have had the right to have that bill before it, to have summoned the gentlemen of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, if necessary, to present the papers on which they acted, to have summoned the Postmaster-General, to have summoned the men who are supposed to own these ships, to have gone into the whole question, and to have considered it. Instead of that this committee deliberately held back this measure for five days after the Committee on Appropriations had reported the Post-Office appropriation bill to the Senate, after the Committee on Appropriations were powerless to consider any question connected with the bill, to call any officer of the Government to bring any paper, to call upon the Senator from Michigan or the Senator from Texas, or the Senator from anywhere else to furnish us with the information upon which the Post-Office Committee were acting; and after they had thus avoided all possibility of an adverse report, which adverse report might have been fatal to this enterprise, they now seek to bring it in, holding it back until we could no longer expose whatever was wrong in it, could no longer develop the want of necessity for it, and had no power over it, and then they say they referred it to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me to make a single suggestion to him?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator is laboring under a great mistake if he supposes there was any intentional delay on the part of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] its able and honored chairman, was absent in his own State. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] was also absent from these halls. The very day that they arrived here, the chairman called a meeting of that committee; and we sought to get the amendment before the Appropriations Committee before they reported the bill; but from the absence of the members of the committee and two of them a part of a subcommittee to whom the subject had been referred, it was an impossibility. I assure the Senator from Kentucky that there was no intention on the part of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to delay the matter.

Mr. BECK. I am not dealing with the intention of gentlemen. I am speaking of the facts on record.

Mr. MAXEY. "Deliberately withheld," I think was the charge.

Mr. BECK. They withheld it. It did not come before the Committee on Appropriations till days after the bill was reported. I presume that everything is done with deliberation in this body. We had this Post-Office appropriation bill before us in the Committee on Appropriations, and we had every officer of the Post-Office Department before the subcommittee of which I was a member and the Senator from Pennsylvania chairman. We kept it for days and consulted upon every question; we then laid it before the full committee; we held it there; we inquired whether there was to be any proposition of subsidy before us, and we had subsidy men on that committee and no man said that any such intention existed.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky if he has any reason to suppose that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads did not give to this subject as full and fair consideration as the Committee on Appropriations would have given to it?

Mr. BECK. Well, sir——

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. Wait a moment. I cannot answer everybody at once. I will answer one at a time. The Senator from Alabama asked me if I did not think the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads gave it as fair consideration as the Committee on Appropriations could have given it if it were before them. I have no reason to believe that they did not; but if they intended to act on their own responsibility, then they ought to have presented the bill to the Senate which they had so carefully and so well considered, placed it upon the Calendar, and given the Senate the benefit of the consideration they had given it, and not seek to put it on this appropriation bill, because they had referred it to a committee that never had a chance to consider it. If it is to be in order without referring it to the Committee on Appropriations because of the full consideration given to it by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, well; if it is to be in order because it was sent to the Committee on Appropriations, and is to be made part of their bill because it was so sent, then I deny that the Committee on Appropriations had any possible chance to consider it, to expose its defects, to make an adverse report upon it, and give it whatever effect that adverse report would have given it.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no rule of the Senate which requires that any bill shall be considered by two committees before it can be considered by this body. No such rule is found in all this code of rules for the government of this body. The consideration of one committee is all that is required.

Mr. BECK. Is that a speech or a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The Senator from Kentucky declines to yield.

Mr. BECK. I do for a speech.

Mr. MORGAN. What I have said is a mere observation. These may be antagonistic committees, perhaps, and I notice that a row is raised every time any committee here is supposed to come in the slightest degree in collision with the Committee on Appropriations, of which the honorable Senator is a member, and I believe they are about to absorb all the powers of legislation of this body as I understand, if their claims be conceded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Kentucky declines to be interrupted, the Chair will protect him.

Mr. BECK. I would rather not be interrupted; and I wish to notice that last remark that we were seeking to monopolize all the powers of this Government and of the committees of this House——

Mr. MORGAN. I said the Committee on Appropriations were about to absorb them if the present claim were conceded.

Mr. BECK. Absorb!

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. Let me go on if the Senator from Alabama will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, if it is the rule of this body that anything can be brought before it that has been considered by one committee only, why is it necessary to have a rule of the Senate that it should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations before it can be made properly a part of their bill? That seems to be a rule requiring that it should be referred to them if it is to be made a part of a bill that that committee has under consideration. The consideration of a single committee, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, will entitle a measure to be placed upon the Calendar and be considered in the Senate as a bill coming from that committee; but if it is to be made a part of an appropriation bill that comes from the Committee on Appropriations, then it has to be sent to that committee, and if so sent that committee ought to have a right to look at it, ought to have a chance to consider it, ought to have the facts before them, and ought to have a right to make an adverse report if they think an adverse report should be made. All these things were denied them in this case. If I said they were designedly denied, I did not mean that. The Senator from Maine and the Senator from Texas will understand me. I am not sure that I may not have used some expression which may be tortured into that; but my meaning was that it was held back after we had given ample opportunity by keeping the Post-Office bill in subcommittee for several days, by considering it in the full committee, by waiting fairly to give every person an opportunity who had anything to say.

As to the Committee on Appropriations absorbing all power, I have only to say that it is fortunate for this Government and for the Treasury of the United States, in my opinion, that there is some committee of this body and of the other House not connected with any Department of the Government. I never saw a matter come up relating to the national banks that the Comptroller of the Currency did not seek to make himself the champion of those whom he had to look after. I never saw anything relative to the Army come up that the Committee on Military Affairs did not seem to think it was an outrage on the part of the rest of the Senate if they did not do what that committee thought ought to be done with the great department they had charge of. The Committee on Naval Affairs seem to think they are the special guardians of the Navy, and that all the other members of the Senate are against it. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads seem to think that they must not only take charge of everything connected with the Post-Office Department, but they must run the commerce of the country in the name of the Post-Office. And so it is, each one of the committees having charge of special affairs press those matters especially; and it is only when a measure comes before the Committee on Appropriations, that has to do with no Department of the Government, and has no special championship of any of them, and has nothing to do with any of them, and is not thrown in special contact with any of them, that the whole question is looked at with regard to the interests of the public. I am glad to see my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] nodding acquiescence to that, for he and I stood side by side for six years and suffered under some of the things I am now speaking of at the other end of this Capitol.

So, when the Senator from Alabama comes to analyze the suggestion he has made, that we are absorbing everything, in my judgment he will find it is fortunate for the country that we are absorbing some of it. I have never heard this Committee on Appropriations here charged with extravagance. I have at the other end sometimes; but I think that all the action of this Committee on Appropriations shows that we are endeavoring to keep down the expenditures of the Government, and keep out of our necessary appropriation bills all legislation that is not germane to them. Here we are striving to keep out that what is foreign to the object of running the Post-Office Department. The question in regard to the great commercial relations of this country, whether with Brazil, with England, with France, or any other country, should be considered upon independent propositions, standing on their own merits, and not on bills which the rules require shall be merely to make appropriations in accordance with existing laws, and to carry out existing laws. That requirement is much better observed when outside issues and questions not provided for by law stand upon an independent footing, and when the Senate and House once pass them we never fail to appropriate money to carry them on. To have a matter of this kind put on a bill like this, when we have had no opportunity to consider it, which was laid before the Senate five days after the bill had passed from us, thereby depriving the Senate of the benefit of the investigation of the Committee on Appropriations, does not, in my opinion, give the tax-payers of the country the chance they ought to have and would have if that committee had had a chance to consider the proposition.

I have endeavored to say nothing about the merits of this proposition. Perhaps I may be heard upon them when it does come up. I do not profess to know very much of the rules, but I have stated my judgment of the matter.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky has seen proper, in what I conceive to be not the correct or true spirit, to arraign a committee of this body, composed of gentlemen in every possible sense his equal, of having deliberately withheld an important bill, intimating thereby that that committee by some covert process was attempting to foist on the country a proposition against the best interests of the country.

Mr. BECK. I explained that.

Mr. MAXEY. A statement of that kind should never be made unless it is sustained by facts. What are the facts in regard to it? The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN]—and I am thankful for it—very properly stated the reasons. I returned from Texas on last Saturday. I found pending in the Post-Office Committee a bill presented by the Senator from Alabama effecting the object of this amendment, and one by the colleague of the Senator from Kentucky, and perhaps two others. They had not been acted on for the reason given by the Senator from Maine. As soon as I returned on Saturday, the first thing I did was to call a special meeting of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads for the purpose of considering these measures. That committee met on Monday morning. Failing to complete the work on Monday morning, we obtained an order of the Senate authorizing us to sit during the session of the Senate on Monday for the purpose of completing the consideration of the subject. The work was completed on Monday evening, and on Monday evening the report of the committee was made, the 7th of February, and it was referred by the order of the Senate to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Senator from Kentucky assumes, notwithstanding the decision of the Senate to the contrary, that the Committee on Appropriations had no opportunity to examine it. I say that is not true. The committee had not only the opportunity by the record, but notice was given to the Senator in charge of the bill that this amendment had been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and the Senate is presumed to act with some degree of judgment and common sense; and when they made the order referring the amendment to the Committee on Appropriations, notwithstanding that committee had made its report on the appropriation bill, it was evidence that the Senate still controlled that committee and directed that committee to examine that matter.

That was on the 7th instant. The bill was not called up here until the 10th, yesterday. Three days passed by, and during all that time this committee, through the Senator from Kentucky, complain that they had no opportunity to examine it. Sir, the record of the fact overrides the assertion of any man. They had three days to examine it, and yet the Senator sees proper to arraign the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, in every sense the equal of the Committee on Appropriations, because they were by some covert process attempting to take advantage of the Committee on Appropriations; and he arraigns every committee here, the Naval Committee, the Military Committee, and every other committee as intending to do that which is against the best interests of the country, leaving only the Committee on Appropriations as the true and sole defenders of this great country.

> Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed,
> That he is grown so great?

Mr. President, I give to every one on this floor credit, and do it sincerely, for doing his duty, his whole duty, and nothing but his duty to the country. I believe the Senator from Kentucky, from his standpoint, endeavors to do his duty; I endeavor to do mine; and so I give credit to all men here; but I deny the right of any man to arraign one Senator for appearing to be derelict in duty, or seeking by any process to obtain an advantage and run rough-shod into the Treasury to take out money not for the general good of the country.

Mr. President, there has been enough of that kind of thing. The Committee on Appropriations constantly endeavors from the lights before it to do its duty. I have never asserted otherwise. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads endeavors to do its duty, and so I believe every committee of this body endeavors to do its whole duty to the country; and so far as I am concerned, I hold myself responsible, not to the Senator from Kentucky, but to the people of the State which sent me here and to the people of this country for my acts, and they will compare with those, I think, of the Senator from Kentucky.

Sir, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads believed this measure was a wise one and in the best interest of the country. The Senator from Kentucky thinks otherwise. Am I to charge that because his judgment does not agree with mine, therefore he is endeavoring to build up the interest of some one man as against all others? I am proud that it is not in my heart to believe all men who disagree with me are acting in bad faith. I have learned where men can best learn that fact, that honest men may honestly differ. I give to those who differ with me on this proposition credit for as much sincerity as I have in the position I take. I believe that this measure is in the best interest of the country, and therefore I advocate it; and the Post-Office Committee, of which I have the honor to be chairman, by a large majority took that view of the question and so reported, and we are willing to test the sense of the Senate and go before the country on that. Whether the Senator from Kentucky be right or whether we be right, is a question to be settled after the measure is passed.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, it seems to me idle to get into a dispute over a question that is not before the Senate or to lug in here extraneous matter. The question as to whether this amendment was properly referred to the Committee on Appropriations was made by myself as a point of order to the Chair last night; it was discussed; and the Chair ruled the point of order not well taken, and the Senate acquiesced. That question was disposed of. The Senator from Texas well stated that he called my notice to the proposition that he now submits. The Committee on Appropriations were not called together to discuss the subject because I supposed that the matter would come to the Senate and they would have full control of it all. That matter has really passed out of the committee and is on the record. The only question now for the Senate and the one that we ought to approach in the proper spirit it seems to me, and with the determination to have it settled upon what is the law and the proper interpretation of our rule simply is, is this general legislation upon an appropriation bill? That is the point of order that I made to the Senate last night in the performance of my duty in charge of this bill. I endeavored to set it on its feet for the consideration of the Senate. The Chair sustained me that the point of order was well taken, and the Senator from Texas took an appeal, and that appeal is now pending; and the simple question for the determination of the Senate is, not whether the Appropriations Committee is absorbing anything, but are these words "that the Postmaster-General shall have the right to establish mail-steamship lines" general legislation? That is the question. It is not a question as to whether there is to be transportation of foreign mails by routes now in existence; but the simple question for the Senate now to determine on this bill is, has the Postmaster-General under this clause the power to establish mail-steamship lines, and if so is not that general legislation? They do not exist now. Mail-steamship lines are to be established, which implies its creation of the steamship itself, the enactment of the route on which and the ports between which the steamship is to sail, everything that is necessary to the starting of the mail from our shores and to the reception of it in another country, to the vehicle that transports the mail and all that surrounds that question. These are questions of legislation all of which are involved in this single proposition.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WALLACE. Certainly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Does this direct the Postmaster-General or the contracting company to carry the mail in these steamship lines?

Mr. WALLACE. When there is no route established, when there is no power of law to authorize the hire of steamships, when there is no power of law to create steamships, this is entirely a new proposition; it is not giving simply a power he expend money for the transportation of the mail, but it is voting money for the establishment of mail-steamship lines. I answer in the words of the amendment.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I ask the Senator, is not the whole ocean a post-route? Is not every navigable stream a post-route? If the ocean is a post-route now under the general law, does the contract by the Postmaster-General to carry the mail on it establish a line?

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator does not take the amendment in its very words in asking his question.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Suppose I put it, then, that the additional inducement of a mail contract would induce private corporations to establish a line for the purpose of carrying the mails, does the company establish the line, or does the Postmaster-General establish the line? Does not the company establish the line; does not the company build the steamship; and does not the Postmaster-General simply contract with that company to carry the mails?

Mr. WALLACE. If the Senator from Georgia will put the amendment in the form which it ought to be "for the transportation of foreign mails," and giving power to execute a contract under the statute as it exists, he will be within the rule, and it will not be general legislation; but I answer in the words of the amendment itself, it is for "the establishment of mail-steamship lines," and it involves the use of the ships, the creation of the ships, the ports between which they are to run; all that is to be done by the Postmaster-General, and if that be not general legislation what is it?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Now, I call the attention of the Senator to the law, and ask him if this amendment is any different from this, if it proposes general legislation more emphatically than this, or if it establishes a steam line more emphatically than this establishes a line?

SEC. 4002. The mail between the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the United States touching at a foreign port, shall be transported in steamships; but the Postmaster-General may have such transportation performed by sailing-vessels when the service can be facilitated thereby.

Does that establish steamship lines by the Postmaster-General?

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator from Georgia answers the point of order in regard to general legislation by quoting general legislation from the statute-book.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The very point is, is not the amendment now proposed simply a provision to enable the Postmaster-General to carry out existing law?

Mr. WALLACE. It does not contain an appropriation for the transportation of the mails upon mail-routes now in existence, and that is the point toward which appropriation bills usually go.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. WALLACE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask him how the foreign mails are now carried under existing law; and if there is any difference between it and the propositions now pending; it is not in favor of American ships?

Mr. WALLACE. Should the Senator take the bill which has been passed through the Committee of the Whole he will find how appropriations are made, and he will find on page 8, line 184, the appropriations for foreign mails in these words:

For transportation of foreign mails, $225,000.

That is the way we make provision for the transportation of foreign mails.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. How are the mails now carried to Great Britain?

Mr. WALLACE. They are carried to Great Britain under a special contract made in reference to the amount of postage.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. In what description of ships?

Mr. WALLACE. In steamships.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Owned abroad? That is what I want to get at.

Mr. WALLACE. Then let us come back to the question; let us hold ourselves to the single question involved in this measure. There is no use of getting excited over it. The whole, single point is, do the words "for the establishment of mail-steamship lines" involve the duty of general legislation, the creation of general legislation by the Postmaster-General? If they do, then this amendment is not in order; if they do not, it is, and that is all there is of this question.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I intend, at the invitation of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to confine myself strictly and legitimately to the question presented, which is whether the ruling of the Chair yesterday evening on this question of order is correct. The Chair ruled yesterday that the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to the Post-Office Appropriation bill was not in order because under clause 1 of Rule 29 of the Senate it proposed general legislation, and therefore is obnoxious to that rule. The word to be construed to get at the meaning of the rule in regard to this amendment is the word "general." Certainly this is a general appropriation bill. Now by implication under this rule which denies the power to receive an amendment that proposes general legislation, of course special legislation may be in order by way of amendment. That is as clearly to be inferred from the rule as if it was stated in so many words. Special legislation is allowed, then, to what? To the particular matter in hand. What is that? That is to the postal service of the United States. We cannot, by an amendment, put anything in reference to the distribution of pensions upon this bill. We cannot tack on the Geneva award, under this rule, to this bill. We cannot tack on the Indian serveralty bill by an amendment to this bill. Nor can we put on anything that is not germane to and connected with the postal service by an amendment to this bill.

That is all that Rule 29 attempted to provide against; that is to say, no general legislation lying outside of the subject-matter itself shall be incorporated by an amendment upon a general appropriation bill. That is all there is in the rule, because I wish Senators to observe how completely and how fairly would be emasculated the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations itself if this were not the rule, because the committee can no more usurp this power in presenting a bill here than can any Senator violate the rule by proposing general legislation on this bill. Yesterday evening in the few remarks I made I referred to some portions of this bill. It is largely composed of general legislation, according to the definition of the Senator from Pennsylvania. There is scarcely a paragraph in it, certainly not a page in it, that is without some general legislation, according to the interpretation of the Senator from Pennsylvania, which I do not concede to be "general legislation" within the interpretation of this rule. I adverted yesterday to the provision in lines 28, 29, and coming down to line 59, which begins:

And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to take the necessary steps to rent a suitable building or buildings for the use of the money-order office of the Post-Office Department.

Then further on, on page 5:

And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to expend not to exceed $25,000 thereof for special railroad service between the Union Depot in East Saint Louis, Illinois, and the Union Depot in Saint Louis, Missouri; and such sum shall include depot room and transfer service at each terminal—

An amendment put on by the committee, I believe on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

Then in line 107 I find:

Said company shall have its pay reduced 10 per cent. on the rates fixed in section 4002 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by act of July 12, 1876, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," &c.

There it goes on and absolutely repeals existing legislation. Now this amendment only seeks to modify the law which has been read by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] which makes the great ocean a highway for the carrying of the mails of the United States. That is all there is of it. It is not within the ingenuity of man to fritter this rule away under the clause as to general legislation, which has reference entirely to propositions and subjects-matter outside of the particular object and scope of the bill.

The Senator from Pennsylvaua says that this makes a steamship service. Very well; that question is res adjudicata in the Senate. In the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress the Senate had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 6143) "making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," just the bill we have here; and "on the question to agree to the amendment reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to establish ocean mail-steamship service between the United States and Brazil, a question of order was raised 'that the amendment was not germane to the subject-matter contained in the bill, and could not properly be included in it.'" The Chair submitted the question to the Senate for its decision. It was determined that the amendment was in order—yeas 39, nays 23. A second question of order was raised, to wit: "that the amendment proposed general legislation"——

Mr. CONKLING. What instance does the Senator refer to?

Mr. GARLAND. I am referring to the decision in the Forty-fifth Congress, third session, on the Post-Office appropriation bill. "A second question of order was raised, to wit: that the amendment," that is, the amendment reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to establish mail-steamship service between the United States and Brazil, was out of order under Rule 29. The first question of order was that it was not germane. The Senate said it was. Then came the second question:

That the amendment proposed general legislation to a general appropriation bill, and could not be received under the first clause of the twenty-ninth rule.

The Chair submitted the question to the Senate: "Is the amendment in order?"—

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 26.

That is just this question. That amendment was to establish a mail-steamship service that did not then exist, which is just what this is intended to do, and the particular limitation, between the United States and Brazil, does not take it out of the operation of this rule, because under this the Postmaster-General may establish a line from here to Brazil or from here to anywhere else. It does seem to me that the interpretation of the words "general legislation" in Rule 29 leaves no room to doubt; but if there was room to doubt, here is a case where after a long and somewhat tedious discussion, which all who were here then remember, the Senate solemnly adjudicated that such an amendment was in order to just exactly this bill from the same committee.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has substantially answered the point made by the Senator from Kentucky when he criticised the course pursued by that committee. I intended to obtain the floor for the purpose of restating what had been said by the Senator from Maine that so far as the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was concerned he had discharged fully his duty. Having arrived here at a late day, he availed himself of the very first day, last Monday, to call the committee together to consider the very subject now pending before the Senate.

Now I want to say in that regard that not only did this committee sit during its ordinary hours, but the chairman called the committee together in special session on the same day in the afternoon, and hour after hour was spent in the consideration of this subject and this alone. So then, so far as consideration is concerned, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads gave it every attention that could be demanded of them, and when they had arrived at a conclusion at a late hour on Monday evening, the chairman was directed to report to the Senate this amendment. Now a member of the Committee on Appropriations states in the hearing of the Senate that every amendment should be submitted to that committee before they have concluded their judgment upon the bill to which an amendment relates. I desire to recall the attention of the Senate to the fact and I especially call attention to the bill appropriating money for rivers and harbors, how often when that bill has been pending have amendments been submitted to the Senate and referred to the committee in order to come within the rule? No Senator upon this floor has ever contended before that an amendment of that kind should be referred before the committee had concluded its work upon the appropriation bill before it.

Our Committee on Appropriations is industrious; and in saying that I pay it the compliment that every Senator will pay it. It not only discharges its duty, but it is perhaps if not more industrious than any other at least as industrious as any committee of the Senate. I understand this committee sits every day. Is it not so? A member of the Senate before me assents to that statement, that the committee sits every day. This amendment was referred to it on the 7th, on Monday last, and to-day is Friday, the 11th; so that the Committee on Appropriations has had so many days' notice of this amendment for consideration, and if that committee has not considered it, it is not the fault of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, nor of the chairman of that committee who moved the amendment.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate for a few moments to the merits of this question. The amendment does not establish any steamship lines. The bill itself appropriates $225,000 for foreign postal service, and that in the judgment of the Senator from Kentucky is perfectly legitimate. This amendment provides for additional postal service and makes an appropriation of $1,000,000 for that purpose. What further does it say? Not that steamships shall be built, not that any particular line shall be established, but it simply restrains the Postmaster-General to an equitable distribution of the service upon the public waters, saying that between the Atlantic, Mexican-Gulf, and Pacific ports there shall be an equitable distribution of the postal lines to foreign nations.

What more does it say? That the service shall not be performed, except by steamships owned by American citizens—not built by American citizens, but owned and manned by American citizens; so that if there are no such steamships, not a dollar of the appropriation can be taken; and I say here to-day, that no steamship line is intimated or established by this amendment. It is simply saying to the Postmaster-General whenever you shall add to the postal service upon the great waters between this country and foreign nations, it shall be upon steamships owned and manned by American citizens, simply that and nothing else.

The Senator from Arkansas has well said that when the question of subsidy for a line between this Government and Brazil was up, when the proposition offered clearly was the establishment of a line and defining the character of the vessel that it should be a steamship of so many tons burden, built of iron, the Senate decided that it was in order as an amendment to an appropriation bill. Here is an appropriation simply adding to the appropriation for postal service. The Senator from Georgia well said that the waters of our country and between it and foreign countries are post-routes so established by law. The Postmaster-General to-day under the law is authorized to establish postal service upon the water. He can establish postal service not only there but upon land upon all railroads. There are many routes to-day where service is not placed. That matter is left entirely to the discretion of the Postmaster-General. Why? Because you limit the appropriation and it is but right and just that you should leave it to his discretion. Here you propose to vote a million dollars, and to say to the Postmaster-General that in his discretion he shall place the mails upon certain ships that shall best serve the postal interests of the country. That is the whole nature of the amendment.

I recall the attention of the Senate to a case where an amendment, I think was offered by the Senator from Louisiana, not now in his seat, [Mr. KELLOGG,] to the sundry civil appropriation bill regulating the Federal election laws and on a point of order that it was not in order and an appeal taken to the Senate from the ruling of the Chair, the Senate sustained the right to move the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana. I say where there is perfect relevancy, where there is simply an additional appropriation to an appropriation for the same service in the bill, the point of order is not well taken, and I hope the Senate will overrule the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WHYTE. I only desire to say a few words upon the subject of this point of order. This bill is sought to be amended by interpolating a clause of this character:

> For additional postal service to foreign countries, $1,000,000, to be expended, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, in the establishment of mail-steamship lines, equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican-Gulf, and Pacific ports, &c.

So that this million of dollars is not to be appropriated to pay specifically for carrying the foreign mails, but it is a lumping appropriation to be equitably distributed among steamship lines to be established by the Postmaster-General. If that is not subsidy in the broadest and baldest sense, I do not know what subsidy is. That is the proposition.

Then the proviso is:

> That the vessels employed for such service shall be owned and manned by American citizens, and that said vessels thus employed shall be iron steamships, accepted by the Secretary of the Navy, after due inspection, as in all respects seaworthy and properly fitted for such service.

The objection made to that amendment is that it is general legislation, and the Senator from Arkansas refers us to the terms of the bill itself. One of his references is to the bill itself as an argument why the objection to this amendment ought not to prevail, because the bill itself contains some general legislation. That is no argument, and I was surprised to hear it come from the Senator from Arkansas. The amendment is the point, not the bill. Of course the original bill could contain general legislation. The point is that the amendment contains general legislation, and therefore is not to be adopted or received to a general appropriation bill. Now, what is general legislation?

The Senator from Arkansas, with his acuteness as a lawyer, undertakes to discriminate between general legislation and special legislation; but that is not what I understand to be meant by the use of the words "general legislation" in this rule. "General legislation" as used in this rule is understood to be that which in parliamentary usage has been so known since 1837 in the House of Representatives, and subsequently in the Senate. It is any legislation which changes existing law; that shall not be put on an appropriation bill by way of amendment. That is what it means. The appropriation bill is to carry out existing law. That is what it is for. A general appropriation bill everybody knows is a bill appropriating money to carry out that which is regulated by the existing law, and these bills are divided into several classes, I think now about thirteen appropriation bills in all general in their character. They are intended to cover expenditures regulated by existing law.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Wherein does this amendment change the existing law?

Mr. WHYTE. I am going to show directly. First, I want to establish the fact that that is the legislation at which the rule strikes, legislation which changes existing law, because a general appropriation bill is to carry out existing law and to provide means to pay for those expenses which are regulated by existing law. That is what I understand a general appropriation bill to be.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me to interpose for a moment?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I see clearly the distinction the Senator states between an appropriation bill and an amendment to an appropriation bill, and I agree with him that the rule is leveled at amendments. I ask the Senator, however, in view of that distinction, what becomes of an amendment printed here on the face of the bill on page 2, and I ask him that question not because the decrees of the Appropriations Committee change or even construe the rules of the Senate, but because if this rule is to be good for anything, if it is worth contending for at all, it must be uniform in its operation. Here as I understand, on the motion to be sure of the Committee on Appropriations—which I must say I do not think makes an amendment any more competent than if it was on the motion of my friend from Maryland—is an amendment striking out what was found in the House bill and putting in I will not stop to count how many lines which change existing law and make provision for the modus operandi of letting mail contracts in every State, if I understand it, and in every Territory of the United States. Now what will the Senator from Maryland do with that, although the text of the bill may escape his observation under the distinction he has drawn—what will he do with the thing which is confessedly an amendment on the face of this bill which does not appropriate money and does nothing except to uproot and change existing law?

Mr. WHYTE. I do not do anything with it at all. It is a report from the Committee on Appropriations amending the character of the language of the bill itself, which had been no doubt inserted by those astute publishers of newspapers in the District of Columbia who wanted to make a recent act passed by this body apply to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CONKLING. But does that make it any more competent under the rule?

Mr. WHYTE. Not a bit; but no objection was made to it. I am not arguing in favor of it. I think it was against the rule, as the Senator from New York no doubt saw. I agree with him.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York has very properly suggested to me that the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations on page 2 of the bill may be liable to the very objection that I am now urging against the amendment proposed by the Post-Office Committee; but that does not make it any better. No question of order was raised upon that amendment; it passed nem. con. both in Committee of the Whole and in the Senate, and therefore it is out of the way for me to stop to discuss that. I come back to the point at which I was when the Senator from New York interrupted me.

I say that a general appropriation bill being a bill to carry out existing law, it was intended by both Houses of Congress, though the language is not exactly the same, but the spirit of the rule is the same, to prevent the tacking on to a general appropriation bill of an amendment that changed existing law, because the idea was that an appropriation bill general in its character was only executing the existing law by providing the money for it. Now, I refer to the old rules of the House of Representatives, not referring to anything that has been transacted in the House, which I have no right to do under the rule, but referring to this as a matter of parliamentary history, which is perfectly proper in debate, and the spirit of this very rule is incorporated in the rule of the House, the old rule of 1837, and the more recent rule of 1876, which provides in these terms:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law—

That was the old rule. You could not introduce it at all if it had not been previously authorized by law; but it went on a little further—unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall—

Not increase the appropriations, but—retrench expenditures.

That was the object. No appropriation was allowed to change existing law unless you could get it in under the theory that it reduced the appropriation instead of enlarging it. An amendment containing an appropriation increasing the amount in a general appropriation bill was out of order if it changed existing law, and it must change existing law if it increased, because the appropriation bill was supposed to be carrying out existing law.

Now, does not this change existing law? The Senators, every one of them, who have argued in favor of this amendment being in order have out of their own mouths condemned themselves by the very authority to which they have referred, the Revised Statutes. Every one of them shows that the existing law limits the Postmaster-General in the amount of money that he can pay to American steamships and limits him also to the amount he can pay to foreign vessels.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator from Maryland whether he is quoting now as the law the rule that is at present obligatory on the Senate or the rule that used to be obligatory on the House?

Mr. WHYTE. I am quoting the rule which emanated from the House and which in its spirit has been adopted in the Senate, which existed as far back as 1837, has been re-enacted in 1876 in more specific terms, but which is ingrafted in the rules of the Senate almost in totidem verbis. The words "general legislation" refer to the change of existing law, and have always been so understood except when a majority of the Senate in the exercise of their wisdom and their judgment have chosen to vote otherwise, and which sometimes happens, I admit.

Now, Mr. President, the law expressly provides a limitation of the amount which shall be paid, and that is for carrying the mail; it is the sea postage and the inland postage to American vessels, and sea postage to others according to this clause in the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 4009. For transporting the mail between the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the United States touching at a foreign port, the Postmaster-General may allow as compensation, if by a United States steamship, any sum not exceeding the sea and United States inland postage; and if by a foreign steamship or by a sailing-vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea postage, on the mail so transported.

That is to be repealed by this amendment, and in lieu of that a bonus, a distribution, a gift enterprise is to be established at the Post-Office Department and a million of dollars are to be equitably distributed between the steamship lines which the Postmaster-General may choose to establish if he can get ships owned and manned by American sailors, and they be of iron. Where are the ships? Who can get them during the time that this appropriation runs—for one year?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Maryland in discussing the point of order has gone into the merits of this question. I beg to say to him that I will not vote for any amendment that does not give opportunity to American citizens who may desire to contract to carry the mail to get their ships wherever they can buy them; and so it is understood that this amendment provides.

Mr. WHYTE. No, Mr. President, I am not going now into the merits. If it is decided to be in order, I will go into the merits of the measure at the proper time, and to the full extent of my ability endeavor to defeat it. I look upon it as a subsidy of the clearest character, and I feel that it is my duty to oppose it if it comes before the Senate. I do not object to other gentlemen entertaining their views, and I will discuss it respectfully with them. I will say nothing disagreeable, I trust, to any gentleman in the discussion of this subject; but I will discuss it with all the power that I possess, because I believe it is not only reviving that which has been tried and proved a disastrous failure in the past, but that it is opening the door of the Treasury for depletion hereafter by all sorts of enterprises inaugurated for the purpose of getting into the public Treasury. But I will not dwell upon that; I am coming back for one moment longer to the point.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator yield to me for a motion to adjourn?

Several SENATORS. Let us get through.

Mr. WHYTE. I shall not take five minutes.

Mr. President, I was about to call the attention of the Senate to what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] had said. I have tried to demonstrate that this term "general legislation" had reference to the changing of existing law, and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] doubtless had that in his mind when he proposed to the Senator from Alabama the insertion of the words "under existing law." The Senator from Alabama saw at once that would not do, because the amendment changes existing law, and under this rule—the old rule of the House—under this rule, which we have adopted in spirit in the Senate, this is general legislation, in my judgment. But the Senator from Arkansas refers us to the action of the Senate in 1879, I think it was, refers us to the action of the Senate on the Brazilian subsidy. I well remember it. We had the subject under discussion then, and a majority of the Senate did decide that the amendment then proposed was in order, and that majority carried the bill through. What was the fate of the bill? It went back to the House; we had a conference on it; the conference failed to agree. Questions of order were raised upon our amendment, and dispute arose between the two Houses, and we appointed a committee of five, of which I had the honor to be one, to investigate the differences between the two Houses, and what was the result? The bill failed, and an extra session of Congress, the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress, was the consequence. It failed; it went by the board; and so I trust that a majority of the Senate will allow this appropriation bill to pass without this amendment on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. EATON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the call of the roll proceeds seeing as I do already a conflict and misunderstanding as to the effect of the vote, I ask the Chair whether I am right in saying that those who vote "nay" vote that the offered amendment is admissible under the rule, and those who vote "yea" vote to exclude the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair understands, not having been presiding at the time when the point was made, that the pending amendment was held to be inadmissible under the first clause of the twenty-ninth rule, from which decision the Senator from Texas took an appeal, which is now pending, and that is the point which is now before the Senate, the question being, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. CONKLING. Not meaning to detain the Senate except for a moment, I shall vote that the offered amendment is admissible under the rule, and I should be glad to give that vote without in form voting to overrule the decision of the Chair, given as that decision was by a Senator who, in addition to being an accomplished parliamentarian, is always just and candid in his decisions. I shall vote that the amendment is admissible, not upon the rule alone as it stands in the print which the Presiding Officer read and on which he decided, but under that rule as it has been construed again and again in instances cited and in other instances as well by the Senate, and by the Senate after discussion and consideration I shall so vote on the rule as it stands construed not only by the Senate but by the committees of the Senate, including the Appropriations Committee now from whom this bill comes, their construction, (as I quote the distinguished Senator from Maryland when I say) being accepted nem. con. by the Senate in Committee of the Whole and also technically in the Senate. They report a bill containing a section which leaving the words "for advertising $35,000" proceeds with many lines to do nothing except to change existing law, confining that change to be sure to the disposition and application to be made of the money spoken of in the section.

Observing the spirit and scope of that amendment, the Senator from Arkansas says and other Senators say that the term "general legislation" as employed in the rule before us applies to legislation dehors the appropriation, legislation alien to that legislation, touching other topics. So the Committee on Appropriations seem to read the rule; so the Senate has given the committee repeated warrant to read the rule, as for example when on an appropriation bill sections were moved regulating the establishing of law touching the holding and verification of elections. I have not forgotten that by a vote of the Senate, after a debate which was thorough if being hot could make it thorough, it was decided that provisions such as I have referred to were not offensive to the rule under which the pending point is made.

So I cannot forget having heard the Senator recite it, although before I was not quite sure of the nature of the amendment or of the very bill to which it was proposed, I remembered, as I stated yesterday in general terms, that an amendment like this, certainly as obnoxious as this in respect of the point of order, was proposed to an appropriation bill; it turns out to this very appropriation bill, the Post-Office appropriation bill; and it was held in order after a full discussion, because I may say without impropriety that the Senate is never so in its glory as on a question of order. Nothing ever receives at the hands of the Senate more copious and more pointed consideration than a thorough-going question of order. After such consideration such an amendment offered to this very appropriation bill was, upon the yeas and nays, ascertaining the views of the Senate member by member, deliberately held to be competent.

It was the saying of a great lawyer and a great judge, in substance—I do not quote his words—that certainty in laws is more important than philosophy; it is not so vital that the law should be right as that the law should be certain. I say that of the rules of the Senate; and if, after all the occasions on which amendments of this sort have been held by the Chair and pronounced by the Senate to be in order, it is thought they should be excluded, then change the rule and make it definite, and make it apply to all committees alike, the Committee on Appropriations as well as the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. In the language of the good book, let there be but "one law" to "him that is homeborn, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you." If the rule is to be good for the Committee on Appropriations to report an amendment changing existing law and doing nothing else, then it seems to me it should be equally good for the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads after they have considered this question as laboriously as I have heard from several members of the Post-Office Committee on this occasion; and it really gave me a sense of fatigue and exhaustion myself when I heard a recital of the way in which that committee had labored over this proposition. I say that I think it should be good for a committee so earnest, so arduous, so industrious as I cannot doubt that committee has been in perfecting and advancing the pending amendment.

Taking it altogether, whatever might be my judgment, as an original question upon this naked rule as it was presented to the Senator who presided when this ruling was made, I feel that I must either observe the repeated constructions given to the rule by the Senate or I must set myself up at a somewhat late day on an independent judgment of my own, and therefore I shall vote that this rule has come to be so in terms broad enough to permit the consideration of this amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. BECK, (when his named was called.) I am paired upon all questions connected with this amendment, and I suppose on the rulings as well, with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] now confined to his house by sickness. I decline to vote on that account.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BRUCE.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] unless my vote should be necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 15, nays 29; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The decision of the Chair is not sustained. The amendment is held to be admissible by the Senate under the first clause of the twenty-ninth rule.

Mr. HAMLIN. The amendment which is now pending was very hastily drawn by the committee, and I have prepared an amendment which I think covers precisely the same ground with the amendment as offered, but with additional guards to it, and I therefore move to amend the proposition by striking out all after the words "Postmaster-General," in the third line, and inserting what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter proposed to be inserted will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the words "Postmaster-General," in line 3, and insert, in lieu of the words stricken out:

And the Postmaster-General is authorized, after due public competition, to enter into contract with the lowest responsible bidders, for terms of ten years, for such transportation between such home and foreign ports as he may in his discretion designate, in order best to promote the postal and commercial interests of the United States, in iron steamships wholly owned by American citizens and registered in American registry, such ships to be duly inspected under the direction of the Postmaster-General and Secretary of the Navy, and be equal in construction, accommodations, safety, and speed to the best vessels on the ocean carrying mails to the same ports, at a rate of compensation not exceeding $30 per mile, one way, for twelve round trips per annum, or the same proportionate rate for a quarter or less number of trips per annum; such contracts to contain all provisions for securing efficient service which may be customary and required by law in such cases. One-fourth part of the appropriation herein made shall be applicable to ports on the Pacific coast, one-fourth part to ports lying south of and including Fortress Monroe and ports on the Gulf of Mexico, and one-half to ports lying north of Fortress Monroe.

Mr. WALLACE. I reserve all points of order on this, but I ask that it be printed for the information of the Senate; and I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let us go into executive session.

Mr. WALLACE. Very well; I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 11, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLYMER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the regular order is the morning hour for the presentation of reports from committees of a private nature.

Mr. KING. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on the Interoceanic Canal.

The SPEAKER. This is Friday, and under the rule only private business can be reported.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the morning hour be dispensed with.

Mr. KING. I ask that the resolution which I send up be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman, because, in the first place, he presents a public proposition, and, secondly, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HUTCHINS,] as the Chair understands, objects to the right of the gentleman to make the report at this time.

Mr. CLYMER. I renew the call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] moves that the morning hour be dispensed with.

The question being taken, the motion of Mr. ATKINS was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having been dispensed with, one hour will now be devoted, in accordance with the new rule, to the call of States in alphabetical order for motions to take up for consideration bills on the several calendars and on the Speaker's table. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE] was recognized yesterday, but when the hour expired the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] was on the floor upon a point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to inquire whether the hour this morning is confined to private bills or whether general bills may be called up?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Michigan on the point of order, and would suggest that the debate on the point be as brief as possible.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to indulge in any debate. I only wish to raise the point whether the call to-day is confined to private bills, or whether the member recognized may call up a public bill.

The SPEAKER. Does not the gentleman think that in vacating other rules in conflict with this new rule, the rule requiring that Friday shall be devoted to private business is also vacated?

Mr. CONGER. I think it vacates that rule.

Mr. FRYE. I think the Committee on Rules so understood it.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that in this hour bills of any kind may be called up.

Mr. FRYE. That is the way we understood it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair concurs with the views thereon as expressed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] The point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] has since the adjournment of yesterday been carefully considered by the Chair in all its bearings, and he desires to state the conclusion which he has reached.

In parliamentary law, as in common law, if two rules or laws are in harmony, both must stand; if in conflict, then the last should be effective. The Chair believes these two rules are practically at variance. If it were held by the House that a bill called up under the new temporary rule, which parted with the property or money of the United States, must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole, then the Chair would recognize and submit immediately a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on such bill which was allowed to come up. The House evidently had the intention and purpose to avoid the delay of the execution of such a proceeding, otherwise the limit of five minutes fixed for debate would not have been inserted in the rule, for in Committee of the Whole the rules make no such limitation. The practice of the House has been by unanimous consent to act upon bills, even though such bills should part with the money or property of the United States. In this rule five objections are required instead of one to prevent the consideration of a bill. It will be noticed that the use of this hour for the purposes stated is not permitted unless two-thirds of the House so order; and the rule further states, not that such bills if permitted to be considered shall be voted upon after five minutes' debate in the Committee of the Whole, but that such bills shall be "voted upon" in "the House."

For the reasons stated and in view of what was manifestly the purpose and intention of the House in adopting this new rule to operate during the remainder of this session of this Congress, the Chair overrules the point of order.

The gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE] is now entitled to the floor for five minutes upon the bill called up by him yesterday.

Mr. BISBEE. I think there will be no objection to the bill; and I do not wish to say anything in explanation of it.

The bill (S. No. 1193) granting a pension to Milton L. Sparr was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Milton L. Sparr, as second lieutenant of Company K, Nineteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. BISBEE. I ask a vote on the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BISBEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The next State in order under this call is the State of Georgia; and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. BLOUNT.

A MEMBER. He is not here.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I was not here when this new rule was adopted, and I do not know how it should be construed; but I would like to know whether in the absence of my colleague [Mr. BLOUNT] the next member in alphabetical order from that State should not be called?

Mr. KEIFER. We do not hear the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is asking whether, when the member entitled to a call under the new rule is absent, the next member in alphabetical order from the same State should be called. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is absent by permission of the House on duty for the House.

A MEMBER. That makes no difference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he has no discretion in the matter. The next State in order is the State of Illinois; and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. ALDRICH.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I call up from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 1935, to confirm to the city of Chicago the title to certain public grounds.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I would like to suggest, if I am not too late, that the object of the rule, as I understand, is to give each State an opportunity to call up a bill. The object of the privilege is not to accommodate personal preferences. Without undertaking to consume any time upon the question, I submit that the House ought to allow the State of Georgia an opportunity now to bring up one bill on this call.

The SPEAKER. Yesterday two States, each having a single Representative, lost their opportunity, and will not again be called unless by unanimous consent until all other members have been called.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. That is because there was nobody here to represent those States. There are other Representatives here from the State of Georgia.

The SPEAKER. In answer to the point raised by the gentleman from Georgia, the rule will be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is not necessary, I suggest, to read the whole rule. The last clause covers the point.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia rises to a question of order, and is entitled to be heard. The last portion of the rule will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Any member not answering as his name shall be called shall be considered to have waived his privilege.

Mr. PRICE. It does not waive the privilege of the State.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I understand that to mean simply this, that the States and Territories shall be called in their order, and to avoid any contest as to who shall represent the State, or what bill shall be presented, the rule was adopted that the first man called alphabetically representing that State should for the time being stand as its sole representative. But the reason of the rule is that the State shall have a hearing and if the colleague first called, as Mr. BLOUNT was, is out of his place by leave of the House on public duty, it is denying the right of the State, I claim unjustly, to pass on when other members are here waiting to introduce measures in behalf of that State. My colleague waived his right, but he cannot waive the right of the State.

Mr. CONGER. This was an individual privilege to each individual member. The call of the State is merely a mode by which we shall reach more conveniently each member. Now, then, when the State is called, the individual member having the first right may present his bill as he might if they were called in alphabetical order. If he is absent, he waives it. The committee so intended, and so the rule states. Let the call now go on to other States, so other individuals may exercise their individual privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is willing to submit the question, that the House may put its own construction on the rule. Shall the point of order as made by the gentleman from Georgia prevail, and control the Chair in his recognitions?

The House divided: and there were—ayes 64, noes 45.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point that no quorum has voted, and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. WHITTHORNE, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. HAMMOND, as tellers.

Mr. McMILLIN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McMILLIN. If a present decision or a decision in the affirmative prevails, will it have the effect to call over the State of Colorado, which has one Representative, ten times before a State having a delegation of ten Representatives is called? [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of an argument as to the propriety of the vote to be given.

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to know what will be the effect so as to know how to vote on the question.

The SPEAKER. When the contingency alluded to arises the Chair will decide.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Each State should have an opportunity to be heard by somebody.

Mr. CALKINS. An affirmative vote bears the Chair out in his ruling on this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that he thought this was an individual right; that that part of the rule which provides the manner in which they should be called was for convenience; but he will submit the question to the House. Now if the House shall sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia, then another name will be called from the State of Georgia.

Mr. CONGER. What then?

The SPEAKER. If that gentleman is not present then another name from Georgia will be called.

Mr. CONGER. Then the whole State may have to be called before another State can be called.

Mr. PRICE. But the State should have at least one recognition.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 59.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia is sustained.

Mr. KEIFER. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. In consequence of this decision by the House, the Chair is required to call another gentleman from Georgia. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. COOK.

Mr. PRICE. The intention was to give to each State the right to respond, and Georgia has responded.

The SPEAKER. The point of order raised as to the State of Georgia was affirmed. The gentleman himself voted to sustain the right of the State of Georgia to be called again, in the person of a member from that State present.

Mr. PRICE. I voted to sustain a response from every State, but only one response.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. We have not had one yet.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia, Mr. COOK, is recognized.

MONEY DUE THE STATE OF GEORGIA.

Mr. COOK. I move to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 3560) to refund to the State of Georgia certain money expended by said State for the common defense in 1777, and to ask that it be put upon its passage.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. CONGER. If there is any time when we should be able to hear all that is read it is when we are asked to grant these unanimous consents.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will personally request, without his mace, members to resume their seats and preserve order.

Mr. CONGER. I am not able to hear anything that is read at the desk.

The SPEAKER. Nor is the Chair able to hear.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that it be read again.

The SPEAKER. If gentlemen want to converse they will accommodate their fellow-members by going to the cloak room.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. This bill is reported from the Committee on Claims, and is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Is there objection to its present consideration? [After a pause.] More than ten gentlemen rising to object, the bill is not before the House for consideration.

PUBLIC GROUNDS IN THE CITY OF CHICAGO.

The State of Illinois being called,

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois, asked the consideration of Senate bill No. 1935, a bill to confirm to the city of Chicago the title to certain public lands.

Mr. WEAVER. I reserve all points of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The point of order on the bill will be the five objections called for to its consideration.

Mr. WEAVER. I object to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object before the bill is read?

Mr. WEAVER. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it requires five objections to the consideration of a bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The bill should be first read before objections are called for.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen evidently know what the substance of the bill is from the title; objection was made as soon as the title was read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I maintain that under the rule it is the right of the member to have the bill read before objection can be made to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. HAYES. I hope that those gentlemen who object to this bill will listen attentively to the reading of it.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is proper now that there should be objections asked for to the reading of the bill, I presume.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now call for objections to the consideration. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] More than twenty gentlemen objecting, the bill is not before the House for consideration.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I was not objecting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not count the gentleman from Illinois. There were twenty and more rising without him.

INDIANAPOLIS A PORT OF DELIVERY.

The State of Indiana being called,

Mr. BAKER asked the consideration of House bill No. 3520, a bill to establish a port of delivery at Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 2568 of the Revised Statutes be amended by adding "Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana," after the words "La Crosse, in Wisconsin."

The SPEAKER. This bill is reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, and is on the House Calendar. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the words "and that section 2997 be amended by adding after the words 'Mobile, in the State of Alabama,' 'Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana.'"

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman offering this bill.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order until after the bill is before the House for consideration.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I simply wish to ask whether the sections you are amending have not been repealed under the act of June, 1880?

Mr. BAKER. I am not advised of that fact——

The SPEAKER. Debate cannot take place before the request for objections. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. This bill has an amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. BAKER. This is a unanimous report from the Committee on Commerce. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let the report be read.

Several MEMBERS. Let us vote on the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. No harm can be done by having the report read, so that we may understand exactly what we are to vote on.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read, instead of the five minutes allowed for discussion.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I insist that no one has a right to occupy my time.

Mr. CLYMER. It is the right of the House to have the report read.

Mr. BAKER. I am entitled to my five minutes if I choose to occupy it. If not, I can have the report read.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the report for the information of the House is proper under the rule in lieu of the five minutes' debate allowed.

Mr. BAKER. But I am entitled to have the report read myself, or to occupy the five minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I withdraw the request for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN S. CORLETT.

The State of Iowa being called,

Mr. CARPENTER asked consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1102) granting a pension to John S. Corlett.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections will be asked for.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, from the date of December 12, 1863, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John S. Corlett, late a teamster in the service of the United States, and pay him the pension of a private from the date of the amputation of his leg by reason of injuries received in line of duty in the service of the United States in the war of the rebellion.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Private Calendar. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. McMILLIN. For one I shall object to the consideration of it unless it is amended so as to cut off the arrears provided for in the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. The general law does that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill. The Chair hears but one. The question is on the engrossment and third reading.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report read.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Iowa is himself entitled to have the report read if he so desires, otherwise he may occupy the entire five minutes, to the exclusion of the reading of the report, with an explanation of the terms of the bill. He alone has the right to demand the reading of the report.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no desire to delay the passage of the bill. I simply suggest that an amendment be incorporated in it to cut off the arrears. If that be done I shall make no objection to its present consideration. Otherwise I feel compelled to do so.

Mr. KEIFER. If the demand of the gentleman to have the report read is allowed, that would cut off the five minutes to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CARPENTER] is entitled.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has not availed himself of the five minutes to which he is entitled under the rule; and the Chair thinks the other members of the House have some rights.

Mr. KEIFER. Not under this rule. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARPENTER. I would like to say that bill passed both Houses in the Forty-fifth Congress, and only failed to become law because it did not reach the President in time to receive his signature.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask for the reading of that portion of the new rule which relates to the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The member making the motion shall be entitled to five minutes for explanation of his bill, or, instead thereof, to the reading of the report accompanying the same, provided the reading of such report shall not exceed five minutes.

Mr. BURROWS. Now, I submit the rule confines the right to call for the reading of the report to the member calling up the bill, and that nobody else can call for it.

Mr. CLYMER. Then we may have to vote for a bill without being in possession of the least information in regard to it.

Mr. BURROWS. That is the rule. The rule is, the member calling up the bill may use five minutes in explanation of it, or instead thereof he may ask for the reading of the report to the extent of five minutes.

Mr. FRYE. This is a matter of some little importance. My judgment of the meaning of the rule is this: if the member who presents the bill desires to occupy five minutes, he has a right to occupy the five minutes to the exclusion of any right of any other member; but if he does not occupy the five minutes, then, under the old rule that a member is entitled to call for the reading of the report, there being no practical conflict in that respect between this rule and the old one, the old rule would prevail, and I, as a member, would be entitled to have the report read to the extent of five minutes.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURROWS. Does not this new rule restrict the reading of the report to five minutes?

Mr. FRYE. It does.

Mr. BURROWS. Is it not therefore in conflict with the old rule?

Mr. FRYE. It is to that extent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, however, thinks it was not the intention of the House in adopting this rule to give a right, five minutes, to one member of the House and if not exercised by such member to deny it to two hundred and ninety-two other members.

Mr. KEIFER. It seems the committee that reported the rule does not understand it as the House does.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. Have not the five minutes allowed to the gentleman who presents the bill been already exhausted?

The SPEAKER. The time taken has been used on the point of order, and should not come out of the time allowed by the rule. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] insist on the reading of the report?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes, sir; unless I can have the amendment I suggested, I want to know the reasons for the passage of this bill.

Mr. KEIFER. Do we understand the point of order to be overruled?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks if the gentleman calling up the bill does not avail himself of the time allowed by the rule the right should belong to any other member to have the report read to the extent of five minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. I give notice that at some time—not upon this bill—we will make that point of order, and appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is at liberty to do that now or hereafter.

Mr. KEIFER. I will not do it now.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of John S. Corlett, having had the same under consideration, respectfully present the following report:

We find from examination of the papers on file with your committee that the evidence in this case shows that John S. Corlett was sworn into the United States service, as a teamster, by G. E. D. Diamond, Government agent at Saint Louis, who took him from Saint Louis to Rolla, Missouri, where he joined a supply-train attached to a portion of the Army under General Curtis. From there he went to Batesville, Arkansas, thence to Helena; that on the way from Batesville to Helena, on or about July 1, 1862, his mule-team took fright and ran down a hill and against a bank in such a manner as to throw him between the mules and crush his leg. He was treated at the post hospital at Helena, and in the Saint Louis City Hospital, at which place his leg was amputated on December 12, 1863. The evidence shows that the injury which said Corlett received, and which caused the loss of his leg, was received while he was in the line of his duty and in the service of the United States, and that said injury was not received in consequence of any fault or negligence on his part.

A petition for the relief of said Corlett is signed by the judge of the eleventh district of Iowa, the circuit judge, and a large number of other highly reputable persons and prominent citizens of the district in which said Corlett resides.

Your committee are aware of the fact that there is nothing in the general pension laws providing for such a case as that presented herein, but we are reminded of the fact that in equity this petitioner should be entitled to the benefits of the provisions of the pension law. We are further reminded that there have been numerous cases of a similar nature admitted to pension, and in view of these precedents we report favorably upon the prayer of the petitioner, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill (H. R. No. 1102) granting a pension to John S. Corlett.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CARPENTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LEAVENWORTH, KANSAS.

The State of Kansas was called.

Mr. ANDERSON. I call up the bill (H. R. No. 6013) for a public building at Leavenworth, Kansas, reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. Speaker, is it in order to make a statement before objection is called for?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The rule provides the objections shall be in order after the reading of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is it in order to call for the reading of the report before objections are called for?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state in connection with this bill that heretofore by consent the House adopted an arrangement by which bills for public buildings should be taken up in their order on the Calendar. But the rule recently adopted, the Chair thinks, destroys that arrangement to the extent of allowing a member in this hour to call up such a bill. The positive rule operates as against the understanding. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] Six gentlemen rising object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I make the point that two gentlemen were counted who were not rising to object. I will state there is no public building in that State now.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen who rise to object are the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD,] the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BOUCK,] the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SIMONTON,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER]—six. The Chair is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON. All right. I have got the names, which is what I wanted.

CAPTAIN SOMERVILLE NICHOLSON.

The State of Kentucky being called,

Mr. BLACKBURN called up the bill (S. No. 201) restoring Captain Somerville Nicholson, of the United States Navy, to the active list, said bill being on the Speaker's table.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to restore Somerville Nicholson, now a captain on the retired list of the Navy, to the active list, to take rank next after Clark H. Welles: Provided, That no claim for arrearages of pay shall accrue to said Nicholson by reason of restoration under the provisions of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill at this time?

Mr. CALKINS. Let us hear the report read.

The SPEAKER. Objection to the bill, if made at all, must be made immediately after the bill is read.

Mr. PAGE. I suggest that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] be allowed to explain the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order at this time under the rule. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] No gentleman rises to object.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have no objection to the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. There is no House report at the desk, this being a Senate bill on the Speaker's table. Will the gentleman from Kentucky send up the Senate report?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not have it here. I will state that this bill passed the House in the last Congress by more than a three-fourths vote, but failed to pass the Senate. It has now passed the Senate of this Congress, and that is the indorsement with which it comes before the House. A similar bill has been reported favorably to this House by the Committee on Naval Affairs through the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. DAVIDSON.]

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARINE HOSPITAL IN NEW ORLEANS.

The State of Louisiana was called.

Mr. ACKLEN. I call up for consideration House bill No. 6196, to provide for the establishment of a marine hospital in New Orleans, Louisiana. The bill is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and was reported unanimously from the Committee on Commerce.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill at this time? [After a pause.] Seven gentlemen rise and object, which is a sufficient number.

STEPHEN P. BENTON.

The State of Maine was called.

Mr. FRYE. At the request of my colleague, [Mr. REED,] I call up from the Private Calendar House bill No. 5677, granting a pension to Stephen P. Benton.

The bill was read, as follows.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Stephen Porter Benton, a soldier of the war of 1812, at the rate per month as provided by the act approved March 9, 1878, for survivors of the war of 1812.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill at this time? [After a pause.] Only two members rise to object; not a sufficient number.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was ageed to.

JAMES MONROE HEISKELL.

The State of Maryland was called.

Mr. HENKLE. I ask to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time Senate bill No. 1191, for the relief of James Monroe Heiskell, of Baltimore City, Maryland.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That James Monroe Heiskell, of Baltimore City, Maryland, be, and he is hereby, relieved from the operation of section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, being in chapter 1, title 14 of said Revised Statutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering this bill at this time?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not think we can understand what the bill is from the reading. I would like to have some explanation of it.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not now in order.

No objection was made to the consideration of the bill.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HUTCHINS. What is the provision of the statute to which this bill relates?

Mr. HENKLE. It is section 1218 of the Revised Statutes, and this bill is intended to remove political disabilities and to make the party eligible for appointment in the Army or Navy.

Mr. CONGER. I did not rise to object to this bill, but I desire to state that I hope the action of the House at this time will not be cited hereafter as a precedent for other cases.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill; and being taken, upon a division, there were—ayes 129; noes 3.

No further count being called for, the bill was passed.

Mr. HENKLE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF SHIP-BUILDING MATERIALS.

The State of Massachusetts was called.

Mr. BOWMAN. I desire to call up for consideration at this time a bill which is now on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole, reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. It is House bill No. 5969, regulating the importation of raw materials to be manufactured in the United States and used in the construction and repair of vessels employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, or built for foreign account.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. MILLS. It seems to me that that bill involves a change of the system of the tariff laws, and is too important a bill to be considered in this way.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLYMER. I call for the regular order. I believe the hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. The hour for business under this call has expired, and the bill called up by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] will go over until the next hour for such business.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House now go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I rise to a question of personal privilege. During the debate yesterday on the river and harbor bill, I ventured to ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. REAGAN] a question, with perhaps the unseemly audacity of suggesting that he could not answer it. His answer as printed in the RECORD of this morning is a violent impeachment of my sagacity [laughter] and a damaging imputation of ignorance on my part. [Renewed laughter.] Since yesterday I have been studying geography, and I propose now to put the boot on the other foot. I ask the Clerk to read the imputation made by the gentleman as printed in the RECORD of this morning.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. REAGAN. I can answer the gentleman if he will allow me. I will tell him that Sumpawamus Inlet is on East River just within the boundary of the upper part of the city of New York. It is for the improvement of that inlet, and I am sorry to find the gentleman from New York so ignorant of the geography of his own city.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce and this whole House will be astonished to learn that that inlet with the Indian name is not within twenty-five, thirty, or forty miles of the city of New York. [Laughter.] It is not on the East River. It is away down below Babylon, [laughter,] on the Long Island shore, looking off upon the Atlantic Ocean. I protest that thus my original suggestion is brought to a final demonstration—that there was not a man on the Committee on Commerce who knew where Sumpawamus Inlet was; and, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I appeal, if any appeal is necessary in confirmation of my statement, to my colleague [Mr. COVERT] to indorse me.

Mr. COVERT. I desire to say to my colleague and the House that the inlet in question is within the collection district of New York City. It is on the coast of Long Island, but it is within the collection district of New York City; and it was very reasonable that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, giving the hasty examination he was able to give to this matter when it was drawn in question, should say that the inlet was near the city of New York, which is true in point of fact.

Mr. HUMPHREY. If in order, I move a committee of investigation on this subject. [Laughter.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. COX. I raise the question of consideration as against private business.

The SPEAKER. The object the gentleman has can be reached by the House voting down the motion.

Mr. COX. I desire to have the House understand that if this motion be voted down——

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that in order to dispense with the consideration of private business on Friday a two-thirds vote shall be required; and a motion of that sort would properly precede the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. CARLISLE. In order to test the sense of the House, I submit the motion to dispense with the private business for to-day. This will enable the House to decide the question directly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] moves to dispense with private business for to-day. This requires a two-thirds vote.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should refuse to agree to the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, would not the question then be on dispensing with private business so as to enable the House to go on with general business?

The SPEAKER. There is an evident conflict between the rules touching this subject. The Chair has always given precedence on Friday to the motion to dispense with private business, that motion requiring a two-thirds vote; but the Chair has no knowledge how he can enforce the consideration of private business if a majority of the House should be unwilling to consider it.

Mr. PRICE. Why, Mr. Speaker, Rule XXVI provides in specific terms that private business shall be considered on Friday unless by a two-thirds vote it be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes that fact; and he has entertained the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky in obedience to that rule. But if that motion should not be adopted, what power has the Chair to enforce the consideration of private business against the will of a majority of the House?

Mr. PRICE. I think the rule itself settles the question.

Mr. KEIFER. If the House should refuse to dispense with private business, it would have to go on with it or do nothing.

Mr. VALENTINE. That is the rule.

Mr. SPARKS. The motion to go into Committee of the Whole to proceed to the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar requires of course a majority vote for its adoption; and if the majority vote is against it, that defeats the motion, of course.

Mr. CARLISLE. Yet the rule says there must be a two-thirds vote in order to dispense with private business; and for the purpose of relieving the House from the very dilemma in which it would find itself, if the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee were first voted on and negatived, I submit the direct motion to dispense with the consideration of private business.

The SPEAKER. That is the natural and reasonable course of proceeding, the Chair thinks. Rule XXIV, section 6, clause 3, reads:

On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and, if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days.

Mr. BRAGG. It seems to me that another consideration enters into this question. The regular motion being to proceed to the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, if the House should refuse to do so then the next question would be to proceed to the consideration of bills of a private nature not on the Private Calendar, which would give preference to House bills, private in their nature, which have been made special orders. These, I submit, would be entitled to come in and take precedence over any other business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will consider that view of the question, if that point should be reached in this controversy.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CARLISLE to dispense with the consideration of private business, it was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. The Chair now recognizes the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT,] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 95, noes 65.

Mr. SPARKS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPARKS and Mr. BRIGHT were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 91, noes 69.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Pending the announcement of the result of the vote, by unanimous consent the following business was transacted:

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 6599) to change the time for holding circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Virginia, held at Danville, Virginia;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 83) granting condemned cannon to the Morton Monumental Association:

STATUE OF JACOB COLLAMER.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to make an announcement and a request. The delegation from Vermont wish to take up at some time the resolution from the Senate accepting the statue of Jacob Collamer presented by that State. I request by unanimous consent that resolution be taken up to-morrow immediately after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. After the hour under the new rule.

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. And that the ceremonies attending the acceptance of the statue shall then be proceeded with.

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes, sir; and they will not probably take more than an hour.

Mr. ATKINS. Why not do it to-day?

The SPEAKER. The House has already resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope it will be done to-day, for if it goes over until to-morrow I must object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir; and I demand the regular order.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman to agree to fix the time at three o'clock to-day.

Mr. STEPHENS. I cannot be here at three o'clock.

Mr. ATKINS. Then do it now.

Mr. STEPHENS. The delegation is not ready now.

Mr. BRAGG. I object to the consideration of the subject now.

ASA WEEKS.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The first business on the Private Calendar is a bill (H. R. No. 3784) to compensate Asa Weeks for his labor and expenses in perfecting torpedoes, torpedo machinery, and the art of torpedo warfare for the sole and exclusive benefit of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I move, by unanimous consent, that bill be passed over for the present.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

JANE STOUT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4257) granting a pension to Jane Stout.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jane Stout, of Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, widow at the time of his death of Robert Divine, deceased, who was a private in Company E, Forty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and pay her a pension of $8 per month from and after the death of the said Robert Divine, her late husband.

Mr. BROWN. I move to strike out the words "and pay her a pension of $8 per month from and after the death of the said Robert Divine, her late husband."

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4257) granting a pension to Jane Stout, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to make the following report:

Robert Divine was a private in Company E, Forty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, a regiment raised in Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, at the commencement of the war of the rebellion, and continued in service until the close of the war, when it was mustered out of the service. The regiment was engaged in many battles, many of them the most obstinately contested battles that were fought during the war. Its ranks were frequently decimated in action. No regiment in the Union Army saw more active service in the field and none stood higher or achieved more distinction for bravery and courage.

Robert Divine was a faithful and brave soldier, and enjoyed to a high degree the confidence and respect of the officers of the company and regiment to which he belonged. He was especially conspicuous for bravery in the battles of the Wilderness, Spottsylvania, North Ann River, Cold Harbor, and in front of Petersburgh.

While the Union forces were in front of Petersburgh, Divine was connected with the detachment employed in driving tunnels and laying mines to blow up the fortified defenses of that city. While engaged in these operations he was constantly exposed to dampness and the inclemency of the weather, and contracted disease which he thought and said to his captain would prove fatal.

In the summer of 1864, while sick as aforesaid, he secured a furlough and went home to his family at New Philadelphia, near Pottsville, Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, reported to Dr. Howell Halberstadt, United States surgeon at Pottsville, and received medical treatment from him, and also Dr. Heidenright, a medical practitioner near New Philadelphia. Dr. Heidenright notified Captain Bowen, the provost-marshal of that district, and the marshal agreed that Divine should remain at home until he had so far recovered from sickness that it would be perfectly safe for him to return to his command, no matter how long it might be beyond the time granted in his furlough.

When Divine arrived at home his wife, Jane Divine, was dangerously sick with typhus fever, and three of his small children were sick with small-pox. Divine never recovered his health, but continued ill notwithstanding he received faithful medical attention.

On the 7th of November, 1864, in violation of the previous promise of the provost-marshal, Divine was taken from his sick bed, charged as a deserter, and confined in the guard-house at Pottsville, but transferred from there to the United States post hospital at Pottsville. He remained in the hospital sick with pneumonia until the 15th of November, when, by order of the provost-marshal, he was sent to his command, then in the vicinity of Richmond, Virginia, under arrest. His captors succeeded in getting as far as Alexandria, Virginia, with him, when they were obliged, on account of his sickness and exhaustion, to leave him, where he very soon after died. In fact it may be safely assumed, under the sworn testimony in the case, he was virtually in a dying condition when he was taken from the hospital at Pottsville.

After the death of her husband, Jane Divine, his widow, made application to the War Department for the back pay and bounty which she supposed to be due her late husband, and on the 24th day of October, 1865, received notice that her claim was disallowed upon the ground that the record showed that her late husband was a deserter, was arrested as a deserter, and died before he reached his command. Mrs. Divine, finding herself thus left destitute, with a family of small, helpless children solely dependent upon her labor for support, accepted an offer of marriage from a man by the name of Stout. Within two years after her marriage with Stout he was accidentally killed in the mines, and she was left again to struggle for the support of her children.

She comes now to the Congress of her country and asks, in consideration of the service of her husband and the father of her children, for a pension, which the justice of the case would have given her years ago.

The committee are of the opinion that the claimant should be granted a pension, and they recommend that the accompanying bill be passed.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the passage of this bill, but merely to call the attention of the committee to the fact that by the passage of this bill we will establish a new precedent.

The Committee on Pensions in the Forty-fifth Congress considered the question whether they should put upon the pension-roll the widows of deceased soldiers who had remarried, but no action was taken at that time.

Now, I suppose there are 50,000 cases of a like character in the United States to-day, and if we are to open up all these cases it seems to me we should pass a general bill to cover all of them, and not make this an exceptional case. I do not dispute the proposition that this lady is entitled to a pension if it was not for the fact that she had remarried after the death of her husband; but when she did remarry, under the present pension law she forfeits her right and has no right to a pension; and it is also true that if she was drawing a pension up to the time of her marriage it would have ceased from that day. This proposition, therefore, simply establishes a new precedent, and if the committee or if the House is desirous of doing that, and shall vote for this bill, I think it is right that they should know exactly what the effect of it will be. My opposition to it is on the ground, not of the merits of the bill itself, of which I know nothing, but because in my judgment we should not take this claim and make it an exceptional case; and if we are to do it now for this one case, then that whole class of citizens who come under provisions similar to this would have equal grounds for claiming and receiving relief. I simply suggest this to gentlemen who are advocating the passage of this bill.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move a further amendment, to insert:

Provided, That this provision shall cease when the claimant of the present pension shall remarry.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. That amendment, I will suggest, is wholly unnecessary, because the pension would cease in any event if the claimant remarried. She is a widow now, and——

Mr. BROWNE. That is true; but when the act of Congress gives a pension that peculiar clause of the law does not apply. Under the ordinary pension laws if a pension is granted by the Department it would cease if the claimant remarried. But a pension by a special act of Congress continues; it does not cease.

Mr. HAZELTON. That provision of the pension laws only applies to claims granted by the Pension Office.

Mr. BROWNE. That is what I understand. But if the pension is granted by act of Congress it places it upon a different footing.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to the amendment which the gentleman suggests.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to inquire whether this is not a bill to grant a pension to a widow who has remarried since the death of her first husband, who was a soldier; and if it is——

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me to answer his question I will give him the information, for I am familiar with all the facts in this case. This lady now applying for a pension was a widow who remarried after the death of her first husband. After the death of her husband who was a soldier, she made an application for a pension, but her application was rejected in the Pension Office. Finding herself in a destitute condition, with a family of little children to rear, she accepted an offer of marriage from this man Stout and was married to him. Within less than two years after that marriage, this man was killed in the mines. She has remained single ever since, struggling as best she may to rear her children.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. BROWNE. I would like to ask why the bill, then, is not made in favor of the infant children, who are clearly entitled to a pension if any one is.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to inquire if they do not receive a pension now?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. No, sir.

Mr. COFFROTH. They are all over sixteen years of age?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. They have never applied for a pension.

Mr. BREWER. Let me state——

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. BREWER. I simply want to answer a question. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a moment. The gentleman from Ohio asks if the children were not receiving a pension. I answer they are not receiving a pension, and this is the reason, as the report shows: because the widow was unable to procure a pension for herself, or was refused on the ground that the records of the War Department showed that her husband was a deserter from the Army, and hence she was denied a pension. Of course she being denied a pension the children could not obtain it, the same reason applying also to them.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have understood it to be the policy of our Government not to grant pensions to the widows of soldiers any longer than they remain such widows, and if there has been any precedent heretofore where a pension was granted to a widow who had remarried after the death of her first husband, he being a soldier, I am not aware of it. But I do know there are many cases like this in the country, and if we are going to establish a principle by granting a pension in such a case, I think in justice to all parties it should be done by the establishment of a general law. And I am opposed to establishing any such precedent until we have first decided whether we will make other widows who have remarried since the death of their first husbands and again become widows pensioners, whether we will establish a rule covering such cases, and grant pensions to all alike, making no discrimination or distinction.

Mr. COFFROTH. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Suppose this woman had been put upon the pension-rolls by the act of the Commissioner of Pensions on her first application, and had remarried, and her husband had died, would not she be restored to the rolls?

Mr. HENDERSON. I think not; but if so, I have never understood the law. On the contrary, I believe it has been the uniform policy of the Government to refuse pensions in all cases after a remarriage.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say a word now in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] and in explanation of this case.

The record shows, and it is now before this House, that the husband of that woman served more than three years in the Army of the United States, was a brave soldier, and fought in all the campaigns between the Potomac and Richmond. It shows that he lost his life while in the service of the Government; and that he left a destitute widow and children dependent upon the widow. And now if my friends upon the other side of the House, with a case that is as meritorious, that appeals as deeply to our feelings of humanity as this case does, can oppose such a bill as this, then I can see no merit in any special legislation that may be accomplished by this Congress to relieve that class of claimants.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. If I have but three or four minutes I cannot yield; because I desire to call the attention of the House to a circumstance connected with this case, and a part of the history of this country, with which every gentleman on this floor is familiar. This man was sick and furloughed. He went home to a sick family and was sick in his family until he was arrested and brought back to the city of Alexandria where he died. Now, sir, it is in proof among the papers submitted that by some means or another his name went upon the record as a deserter. I know how that happened. When he went home he was placed in charge of a Government surgeon. That surgeon said and the provost-marshal said that he should remain there, although it exceeded the period of time in his furlough, until his health had been restored. But, sir, we had in that country a class of men, as you had everywhere, that were seeking the twenty-five dollar bounties that were given by the Government; and they were industriously looking out every man who had exceeded by one hour the furlough granted him by his commanding officer. They were men of that class that seized this man in his own house after the surgeons, Drs. Habberstadt and Carpenter, and the provost-marshal, Captain James Bowen, had his case under consideration, and had told his doctor, Dr. Heidenright, that he should remain at home until he could safely return to the Army. But these men went to his house and took him out from a sick bed and brought him to the town of Pottsville; and he was sent by order of the provost-marshal into the hospital there, in charge of Dr. Habberstadt, where he remained some eight days. Then these men took him again from a sick bed in the hospital and got him as far as the city of Alexandria, and he died on their hands; the whole constituting a case of inhumanity such as I never witnessed or heard of in all my career.

There are in possession of the Committee on Invalid Pensions letters from Captain Winlack, the captain of that company, asserting again and again it was a wonder to him how this man got on the records here as a deserter. Those letters are among the papers referred to the committee. Captain Winlack again and again tried to procure a pension for this widow woman. He again and again asserted that this man was no deserter. The reason why that went on the records was that when those men came here for their blood-money they had to return the man as a deserter, and they did return him as a deserter after they had left him in the hospital in the city of Alexandria to die.

This is the case which is presented. This woman applies for a pension with this record staring her in the face, and she comes to the Congress of her countrymen and she asks that she, as the widow of a brave soldier that spent three years and a half at the front doing battle for his country, shall not be turned away from the Halls of Congress without that little pittance which may ease and console her declining years.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a question?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. How could those men return this soldier as a deserter unless the captain approved the report on which his name appeared as a deserter?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I do not understand the modus operandi at all. But I do know there are letters which were referred to this committee, and which are among the records in this case, from Captain Winlack, the captain of that company, who says he never returned this soldier as a deserter; that, on the contrary, he knew he was not one.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I want to state, Mr. Chairman, there are hundreds of cases where men were got away from their company in time of battle into hospitals, were lost sight of, and were returned as deserters. I can show any number of such cases in the records of the War Department to-day.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. My question was how they came to return him as a deserter.

Mr. HUMPHREY. When they did not know anything about it they returned the man as a deserter.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RYON] that I do not antagonize this bill on its merits at all. I make no opposition to the pension being granted in this individual case. All I desire the House and the committee to understand is whether we are going to enter upon a new departure in regard to the granting of pensions to the widows of soldiers who have remarried.

Now, I stated that I understood the rule to be that whenever the widow of a soldier receiving a pension married again her pension ceased. I know that since I have been a member of this House there has been opposition to the granting of a pension to a widow under such circumstances, although her second husband had died and she was the second time a widow. I have three cases in my district just as hard as this, just as much entitled to a pension as I think this widow is, because they are destitute and are the widows of soldiers who served their country faithfully; but after the death of the soldier, their first husband, they remarried, and then again became widows. Now, we ought to provide a general law for these cases, it seems to me, if we are to admit at all the principle of granting pensions to widows of soldiers who marry a second time.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Why not grant the pension up to the time of the second marriage?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to that. I only desired to call attention to the precedent we were about to establish.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I understand that is all there is in this case.

Mr. BREWER. I was perhaps the first who made the suggestion, and I wish to state my reasons for so doing. During the last four years I have received many letters from persons situated similar to the person in this case, and I have invariably written to them that Congress had refused to grant pensions in cases of this kind. If this bill had passed without my raising this point I felt that I should be very much embarrassed when I met those persons again. I know it has been against the policy of this House, as it has been against the policy of the Senate, during the last four years, to grant a pension in any case to the widow of a soldier who had remarried. There is no law authorizing it.

I wish to state this further fact, that the very moment the widow of a soldier remarries she ceases to be the widow of that soldier, and thereby relinquishes her claim to the pension to which she might before have been entitled. There are, of course, many cases where the widows of soldiers are receiving pensions. When they voluntarily enter again into the marriage relation they thereby declare that they prefer that relation rather than the amount of pension they are receiving. They enter into that relation voluntarily. When they do so, if the widow was previously drawing a pension, the orphan children of such widow draws the pension to which she was entitled until they respectively reach the age of sixteen years.

As I have already stated, the widow in this case, according to the rule of the Pension Office, was not entitled to a pension. It might be that the records in the Department were incorrect; I apprehend that may have been the case. I make no assertion that the widow was not at the time entitled to a pension. But if she had been receiving it, under the laws of the country she could not continue to receive it after she remarried.

Now, if we pass this bill, what can I say to my constituents at home in my district who have appealed to me to present their bills here in just such cases as this, just as meritorious, and to whom I have said that it was contrary to the policy not only of the House but of the Senate? I feel that I would be embarrassed if I did not raise my voice here and present the question for the consideration of this committee.

If we are to grant pensions simply as a matter of sympathy, as my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RYON] seems to argue here, I know a thousand persons in my own State who are undoubtedly in as poor circumstances, having large families of children to support, as is the person to which this bill relates. Let us have a fixed policy. If the Committee on Invalid Pensions thinks this is a policy which should be adopted by the Government, why have they not during the two years of this Congress presented a general bill to this House, so that all might be treated alike?

Mr. COFFROTH. If there had been any law which would have authorized the granting of this pension, there would have been no necessity for this widow to come to Congress. The Committee on Invalid Pensions took into consideration the fact that this was a case for which the law granted no relief.

Mr. BREWER. I understand your position, and I am not controverting it.

Mr. COFFROTH. And the committee in examining the cases presented before them, if they find that they are such cases as should receive relief, report bills placing them on the pension-roll, as a gratuity.

Mr. HAZELTON. Why do you not report a general bill?

Mr. COFFROTH. We cannot report any general law which will cover all these cases. We have to report upon each case presented to us.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. There is not a case presented to this House for action which is provided for by general law.

Mr. BREWER. I have defined my position, and do not desire to take up the attention of the committee further.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say that I know nothing of the merits of this particular case. I find myself in the position of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BREWER.] I have been writing to remarried women that the law prohibits the granting of pensions to them. I have even gone beyond what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] says he has done: I have endeavored to illustrate to them the wisdom of such a provision of law, by showing that there would be no justice in pensioning a man who had not himself been in the war, simply because he had married the widow of one who had been in the war.

I cannot for my life see where the end will be if we determine that we will pension every man who marries the widow of a worthy soldier.

Mr. BREWER. This proposition is to pension the woman when she has become a widow again.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from Michigan suggests that this bill proposes to pension the woman when she has become a second time a widow. But she is no longer the widow of a soldier; she is the widow of another man. She is not the Widow Smith, if Smith was the name of the soldier, but is the Widow Jones, if the second marriage was with Mr. Jones. I trust, be the merits of this particular case what they may, that the House will vote down this bill, and not involve in the suspicion of falsehood or neglect all those Representatives here who have fairly and frankly stated to applicants for pensions the law and the principle upon which it rests.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BROWNE,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "volunteers" insert:

"Provided, The pension shall cease upon the marriage of the said Jane Stout."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has signified his willingness to accept the amendment. If there be no objection it will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS. I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "the," in the fifth line, and insert "names of the children of Robert Divine, deceased, who are under the age of sixteen years;" so that the bill will read:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the names of the children of Robert Divine, deceased, who are under the age of sixteen years."

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to say a few words in support of this amendment. All pensions allowed by special act of Congress are based upon equities arising out of the service of the soldier. The widow of a deceased soldier succeeds to the equities existing in his favor at the time of his discharge from the service or from his death. Those equities are released by the widow upon her remarriage, and they descend then to the children of the deceased soldier who may be at that time under the age of sixteen years. It is claimed here that this soldier was not pensioned in his lifetime, in fact that he died while in the service. It is claimed that the widow has not been pensioned because there was an entry of "desertion" opposite his name, an entry wrongfully made, it is alleged, and that it was wrongfully made I have no doubt. That is stated as the obstacle which prevented the pensioning of the widow. Yet there are equities in this case. In whose favor? In favor of the minor children. Then I say, if the liberality of Congress is to be invoked in this case, let it be invoked in favor of those children who have inherited the equities arising from the distinguished and gallant services of their father, the deceased soldier, and not in favor of the widow of another man, she having voluntarily forfeited her equities by remarrying.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] is actuated by the purest motives of patriotism and earnestly desires to pension the children of the deceased soldier Divine. But, sir, he overlooks one important fact—that Divine died in 1864, and as a matter of course no child of his could now be under the age of sixteen. Then, if there are no equities in the case, as the gentleman says, he can vote against the bill. But I do not believe in a surreptitious attempt to defeat a bill by indirection. I never believe in insinuations; I believe in direct acts. If the gentleman wants to face the principle of hostility to this bill which provides for pensioning that widow, he has a perfect right to do it; and I am the last man in the world to challenge his motives. But he has no right, while professing to favor the principle of the bill, to defeat it by an amendment which would necessarily preclude the payment of any pension.

This widow labored for years to rear those children—to give them by her hard work, her daily and nightly toil, that which her Government withheld from her upon a record that did not speak the truth. If there ever was a meritorious measure, one appealing to the Representatives of the people in the Congress of the United States, it is a measure in favor of the widow of a man who gave his life to save his country, that widow having toiled for years for the support of her family, and having been denied by her Government that remuneration which her husband earned. It is upon this basis that I place this claim.

Gentlemen say that this woman forfeited her right to a pension by voluntarily remarrying. If she had obtained her pension from the Government and then remarried, I would admit the force of the argument. But she came here for a pension, and it was denied her. Then, surrounded by eight helpless children, she married, not voluntarily, but because she found it necessary to procure for those children the means of an honest living.

Mr. EWING. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] will withdraw his amendment. It is mere mockery. This soldier died during the war, and as a matter of course there are now no children of his under sixteen years of age.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, Mr. Chairman, if there are no children of his under sixteen years of age, I submit that all equities in this case have lapsed, and the parties claiming here are at the end of their string. The placing of this widow upon the pension list, however meritorious she may be, would be the institution of a civil list—a thing that has not been known thus far in this country, and a thing which every member of this House should set his face against.

No man on this floor is more in favor of granting pensions in meritorious cases than I am. Having been a soldier myself, I know exactly what it is to render service to the country in time of war. I think that all meritorious cases should be favorably passed upon without quibble and without delay. But granting pensions to meritorious soldiers, or to the widows and children of meritorious soldiers, is quite a different thing from granting a pension by special act of Congress to "Becky Sharp" simply because "Bill Jones" was a good soldier.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Chairman, just a word on this bill. The principle involved is an important one. In all the Western States the widow, on the death of her husband, succeeds to the homestead of forty or eighty acres, as the case may be, and it is subject to the demand of no debt so long as she remains in widowhood; but the moment she remarries it goes to the heirs, and is subjected to the payment of debts and the appointment of an administrator to settle the estate. The same principle arises in this case. This widow by her own act deprived herself of the benefit under the pension law. Whatever the circumstances may have been under which she remarried, the fact is that by her own act she forfeited the right given to her under the pension laws.

The principle is an important one. If we were to give this widow our sympathy, then we would vote to her this amount of money; but in my district, and every other district represented on the floor of this House, there are probably some whom we have been compelled to tell that by their remarriage they have deprived themselves of the benefit accorded to them by the pension law. If we do not abide by the pension law as it now stands, the result would be to set us afloat on an ocean of doubt and difficulty. Not to abide by the precedents which have been established would be to carry us too far. We might not be able to retrace our steps. The result inevitably would be the expenditure of a large sum of money in carrying into effect the establishment of any such bad precedent.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WILSON. As the gentleman has withdrawn his amendment, there is nothing to which mine would apply.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That the said pension shall only be paid from the death of her first husband to the time of her marriage to said Stout.

Mr. BURROWS. Now, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen on the other side seem to misconceive the ground upon which opposition is made to the passage of this bill, and all this talk about the widow and her necessity, to excite the sympathy of the committee, has no bearing on the case. It seems to me we ought to adhere to the line of policy marked out by the law. The law very properly grants a pension to the widow whose husband served his country and was either shot in battle or died from disease contracted in the service, because that country took from the wife her support, her husband, and seeks by this means to make compensation therefor. It also provides when she shall remarry her pension shall cease, the obligation on the part of the Government having ceased. If she deliberately enters into the marriage relation, knowing the bounty the Government furnishes her for the loss of her husband will be taken from her by reason of that remarriage, it seems to me afterward, if the marriage turns out disastrous, either by reason of death of the second husband, or by reason of his injury, or any other reason it does not prove beneficial to her, we ought not to step in and give her a pension.

I therefore insist the amendment I submit is a proper one, and I shall most heartily support it in giving this person a pension, and placing her on the pension-roll from the death of her first husband to the time of her remarriage. It seems to me that is proper.

Mr. HAZELTON. Does that provide for arrears?

Mr. BURROWS. During the time of her widowhood.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I do not think it gives her arrears at all.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to offer an amendment providing that said pension shall be paid to the children of Robert Divine until they shall reach the age of sixteen years.

Mr. WILSON. That will defeat the whole thing.

Mr. THOMAS. No, it will not; but it will continue her pension after the second marriage to the children of the soldier up to the time they come to sixteen years of age.

Mr. COFFROTH. That is right.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Yes, that is a proper amendment. It should provide that from the date of her second marriage the pension shall be continued to the children of Robert Divine till they reach sixteen years of age.

Mr. THOMAS. I have drawn the amendment up and ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That said pension shall be paid to the minor children of Robert Divine from the date of the second marriage until they shall become respectively sixteen years of age.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania, moved that the bill, as amended, be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY A. CASTERWELLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1467) granting a pension to Mary A. Casterweller.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary A. Casterweller, widow of John Casterweller, late a private in the Fourth Regiment of Pennsylvania Cavalry, and pay her a pension from the passage of this act.

Mr. WARNER. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1467) granting a pension to Mary A. Casterweller, widow of John Casterweller, private in Company C, Fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to make the following report:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Forty-fourth Congress made the following report on this application, and the present committee see no reason to change the report, but adopt the same:

"That the said parties were duly married, and that the said John Casterweller died June 10, 1865, in or near Lynchburgh, State of Virginia, in the line of duty."

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. WISE. It will be seen by the reading of the report, Mr. Chairman, that this bill passed this House in previous Congresses, and only failed for want of time. I move it be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

JESSE T. MYERS.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4028) granting a pension to Jesse T. Myers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Jesse T. Myers, late a private in Company A, Sixth Regiment of Maryland Infantry Volunteers, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $8 per month from the date of his discharge from the Army.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4028) granting a pension to Jesse T. Myers, respectfully report that they have examined the case and find the claimant was enlisted as a private in Company A, Sixth Regiment of Maryland Infantry Volunteers, on the 10th day of August, 1862, to serve three years or during the war, and was discharged from the service on the 11th day of March, 1865, at United States General Hospital Emory, Washington, District of Columbia, by reason of the surgeon's certificate of physical disability; which disability, it appears from the evidence, has been permanent and now incapacitates the claimant from earning a support for himself and family.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. BROWNE. I move to strike out all after the word "pension," in line 7, and insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move that the bill, as amended, be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

LEWIS BLUNDIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2550) granting a pension to Lewis Blundin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lewis Blundin, of Company C, Twenty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, who was stricken down by disease during Sherman's campaign from Atlanta to the sea, which resulted in paralysis; the said pension to commence from the 29th day of March, A. D. 1866, the date of his discharge from the military service of the United States, at the rate of $8 per month.

Mr. GODSHALK. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BROWNE. I move an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GODSHALK. I move to strike out all after the word "volunteers," in the seventh line.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following words:

Who was stricken down by disease during Sherman's campaign from Atlanta to the sea, which resulted in paralysis; the said pension to commence from the 29th day of March, A. D. 1866, the date of his discharge from the military service of the United States, at the rate of $8 per month,

Mr. BROWNE. That meets the object I had in view. I do not desire to move a further amendment.

Mr. COFFROTH. There is no objection on the part of the committee to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GODSHALK. I move that the bill as amended be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

JANE STOUT.

Mr. HAZELTON. Mr. Chairman, on examination of the bill for the relief of Jane Stout passed a few moments ago, it appears that the amendments are entirely inconsistent with each other and render the bill imperfect and defective.

Mr. WILSON. Let the correction be made in the House.

Mr. HAZELTON. It can be done by general consent in a few moments if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] will withdraw his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to which the gentleman refers.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the pension shall cease upon the marriage of the said Jane Stout.

Mr. BROWNE. I hope that there may be unanimous consent given for the withdrawal of the amendment. My object was simply to perfect the bill. I only wanted to perfect the bill.

Mr. WARNER. Let the bill be reported as it will read if amended as proposed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jane Stout, of Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, widow at the time of his death of Robert Divine, deceased, who was a private in Company E, Forty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers: Provided, That said pension shall only be paid from the death of her first husband to the time of her marriage to said Stout: And provided further, That said pension shall be paid to the minor children of Robert Divine from the date of said second marriage until they shall respectively become sixteen years of age.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the amendment?

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

EDWARD H. MITCHELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2549) granting a pension to Edward H. Mitchell.

The bill was read. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Edward H. Mitchell, of Company I, Seventy-first Pennsylvania Volunteers, who was wounded at the battle of White Oak Swamp, July 30, 1862; the said pension to commence from the date of his discharge from the military service of the United States, at the rate of $8 per month.

Mr. GODSHALK. I ask to strike out all after the word "volunteers," in the seventh line.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following: "Who was wounded at the battle of White Oak Swamp, July 30, 1862; the said pension to commence from the date of his discharge from the military service of the United States, at the rate of $8 per month."

Mr. COFFROTH. The Committee on Pensions will accept that amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. Let the bill be reported as it will read if amended.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BURROWS. Let the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2549) granting a pension to Edward H. Mitchell, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

On March 11, 1863, one Edward H. Mitchell filed a claim for pension as late private in Company I, Seventy-first Pennsylvania Volunteers; swears he was discharged February 11, 1863, by reason of a wound received on or about June 30, 1862, while in action at the battle of White Oak Swamp, Virginia, having been shot in both legs by poisoned buckshot, and also by reason of his musket having been struck by a volley and being bent, striking him in the breast and injuring him severely.

Mr. BURROWS. From the reading of the report so far it appears that this soldier was wounded in battle. If so, I withdraw the demand for the reading of the report.

Mr. BROWNE. I would like to know, if he was wounded in battle, why the pension was denied. If some gentleman will explain the reason to the committee, I think it will be satisfactory without the necessity of reading the report.

Mr. COFFROTH. What is the question of the gentleman?

Mr. BROWNE. I wish to know why, if he was wounded in battle, and his disability must have been noticeable, how it happens that his pension was denied by the Pension Office?

Mr. COFFROTH. I do not know that I can answer the gentleman from memory. The report will show, however.

Mr. WARNER. Then let us have the report read.

The Clerk resumed, and concluded the reading of the report, as follows:

In a subsequent application, he swears he was injured in the right leg by a fall while making a charge on the enemy, which ruptured the veins of his legs and terminated in a running sore, rendering him unfit for manual labor; was also wounded in the leg by buckshot supposed to be poisoned, the result of the injury being varicose veins. In a third application he swears he was injured in the back and right leg at same battle, by falling on his back and injuring the same, while in the act of getting over a fence; was rendered unfit for the service, placed in a field hospital, where he lay until the next day, when he was captured by the enemy. That during his service as aforesaid, from fatigue and other causes, he contracted varicose veins, with which he is afflicted up to the present time. Filed with this third paper is an affidavit of one William W. Mannington, who swears he was in the same company, and of his own personal knowledge knows the statements of Mitchell to be correct and true.

The records of the War Department show claimant to have been enlisted June 2, 1861, mustered in June 28, 1861, missing in action at White Oak Swamp June 30, 1862. Also absent, taken prisoner at Malvern Hill, June 31, 1862. Company was in action June 30, 1862. They furnish no evidence that he was wounded. Prisoner-of-war records show him captured June 30, 1862. The records show claimant to have been present with company from enrollment to date of capture, June 30, 1862. Certificate of disability shows him to have been discharged because of "disability caused by varicose veins."

The records of the Surgeon-General's Office show him admitted to field hospital at Newport News, Virginia, July 27, 1862, with "gunshot wound." That he was admitted to camp hospital, paroled prisoners' camp, Annapolis, Maryland, with urticaria (nettle-rash.) His records furnish nothing further as to the disability.

Martin Rizer swears he was late surgeon Seventy-second Pennsylvania Volunteers, chief surgeon second brigade, second division, Second Corps; was present at the above battle; that he is cognizant of the fact that claimant while crossing the bridge fell and injured his back and leg, and was sent to hospital, where he came under his care; was unable to leave and was captured the next day. Makes this statement from his knowledge of the facts.

William P. Tomlinson certifies that he is captain of the company; that claimant was injured in both legs by poisoned buckshot, and also by his musket striking him in the breast, it having been struck by a volley from the enemy; that claimant was in the United States service and in the line of his duty; that the disability incurred has disqualified claimant from performing the duties of a soldier.

The records of the War Department and of the Second Auditor show Rizer and Tomlison to have been present on June 30, 1862, and that their signatures are genuine.

Richard Dingee, M. D., swears he knew claimant prior to his entering the service; that he was a sound, healthy man when he entered the service, free from any injury to the back or right leg; that he has known him professionally since discharge, and that his disabilities have been continuous since discharge.

On July 6, 1863, Wilson Jewell, examining surgeon for pensions, reports claimant as incapacitated one-half for obtaining his subsistence by manual labor; cause, varicose ulcer and veins; that it is his belief it was contracted in the service and in line of duty; that the disability is permanent; that his varicose ulcer and veins should entitle him to one-half disability, provided they were in existence and he was discharged for them.

On April 18, 1876, W. H. Kirk, examining surgeon, reports claimant almost entirely incapacitated from obtaining his subsistence by manual labor, by reason of disability resulting from injury to back and varicose veins. It is his opinion that the disability originated in the service.

This claim was investigated by the secret service division of Pension Office. The investigation cannot be considered a complete one, as the majority of the witnesses do not testify directly, but seem to qualify their replies. They, however, agree to the fact that claimant was able to earn his living prior to enlistment; that they knew of him having a sore on his leg, but never knew of his being affected with varicose veins.

The witnesses generally state he is a temperate man, and some of them in addition state he is a reliable man. It would also appear from the testimony that claimant was examined by a surgeon prior to enlistment and was passed by the surgeon. The special agent states that all the witnesses are intelligent and reliable men, personally known by him, and states that Mitchell never did have any regard for the truth, is now of no account, and never will be. It would appear from the animus of the special agent's statement that he entered upon this examination with prejudice against the claimant and summoned such witnesses as suited his feelings.

Affidavits are filed in the case from various parties, who state of their own knowledge that they were acquainted with him and never knew him to be affected with varicose veins or with weak spine.

On February 20, 1877, a petition, signed by fifty-three citizens of his vicinity, requests the Commissioner of Pensions to grant the pension; that they know the variocose veins were incurred in the service.

The committee are of the opinion that the accompanying bill should pass

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, the report just read does not show at all that this claimant was wounded in the service or that he claims a pension on that account; but shows that the claim is made on the ground of other disabilities of which, from the report I take it, there is no record evidence. I understand further that this is a case which has been made the object of a special examination by the Commissioner of Pensions, and the granting of the pension has been reported against. It seems to me that this report shows clearly that there was no disability on the part of this claimant received in the line of duty, and therefore that he is not entitled to a pension; and it is one of those cases that ought not to come here at all. If he is entitled to the relief sought it ought not to require a special act.

Mr. GODSHALK. It is the old story in regard to this pension claim. This man entered the service in 1861. He was wounded; but owing to the loss of records he could not make out his claim technically before the Pension Office. His claim was rejected from time to time. Finally, the Department sent up to the neighborhood where the man lived a special agent or a secret agent to inquire into the truth of these statements and find out all he could in reference to this case. Now, while this agent reported Mitchell was not a man whose word was to be believed, I know from my own personal knowledge that that special agent would not be believed on his oath, and that Mitchell stands a hundred-fold better in the estimation of the community than the special agent who went up there to investigate his case. I know of my own knowledge this man is believed in the neighborhood where he lives to be a truthful man. He is known to be a man of feeble intellect in some respects and may have been induced in some way to make contrary statements. But it is known to every one there that he went into the service an able man for the service. He was examined prior to his enlistment and passed by the surgeon, and it is known to every one there that he came out of the service a wounded and broken-down man and that he is unable to earn a living.

Mr. WARNER. Does the report show this man was wounded in action?

Mr. GODSHALK. It appears he went into hospital to be treated. This is recorded here in the report.

Mr. WARNER. The report shows he was missing from action.

Mr. GODSHALK. It shows he was taken to hospital.

Mr. BURROWS. I will say in answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] it appears in the report that the captain of the company testified—

That claimant was wounded in both legs by poisoned buckshot, and also by his musket striking him in the breast, it having been struck by a volley from the enemy; that claimant was in the United States service and in the line of his duty.

That is what is said by the captain of the company.

Mr. WARD. It appears, also, in the report that the certificate of disability shows him to have been discharged because of "disability caused by varicose veins." And one of the affidavits, as I understand it, alleges that he was wounded with poisoned buckshot and that the varicose veins were a result of the wound so received; and the record follows him up to the point of the issuing of his discharge by reason of disability caused by that wound. It seems to me there is made out a complete case of disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty.

Mr. BURROWS. There can be no question of that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GODSHALK. I move that the bill, as amended, be laid aside and reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES B. FURMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1452) for the relief of James B. Furman, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. COFFROTH.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of James B. Furman, late a private of Company C, of the Seventh Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-rolls, at the rate of $8 per month, from the date of his discharge from the military service of the United States, in the late war of the rebellion, on account of disease contracted while in the line of duty in said service.

Mr. BROWNE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "rolls" and insert in lieu thereof "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States;" so that it will read:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of James B. Furman, late a private of Company C, of the Seventh Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States."

Mr. WARNER. I had risen to propose the same amendment and to say I thought it was understood in the last session that all these bills were to be made to conform to the principle embodied in that amendment.

Mr. COFFROTH. I will inform the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] that these bills were all reported as early as the 20th of February of last year, before the time when the House adopted the rule to which he refers. All the bills reported since that time have conformed to the rule adopted by the House. The committee make no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WARNER. The statement by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is satisfactory. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1452) granting a pension to James B. Furman, late private in the United States military service, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

After examination, they have adopted the report made by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress, as follows:

"That the said Furman enlisted into the service March 14, 1864, and was discharged August 23, 1864, for an injury received while in the service and in the line of his duty.

"On the 26th of July, 1864, he was detailed to draw some timber for a block-house, at bridge No. 13, near Columbia, Tennessee, and while so engaged he was struck a very violent blow with a lever or pry in the side, which threw him upon a log, causing a very severe hernia. In consequence of this injury he was sent home on a furlough; and the medical evidence shows that when he returned home at that time he was suffering from said injury, and was treated for it. The evidence also shows that he has suffered from said injury ever since his discharge, and that he is now wholly unfitted for labor.

"The committee consider the claimant richly deserving of a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill."

The amendment offered by Mr. BROWNE was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN A. INNES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1885) for the relief of John A. Innes, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. COFFROTH.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore the name of John A. Innes, late a private of Company B, Fifty-first Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, to the pension roll; and he shall be paid in the same manner and to the same amount that he would have been if payment had not been suspended or his name dropped from the roll.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1885) granting a pension to John A. Innes, late of the United States military service, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Having examined the lengthy and exhaustive report made by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress, the committee have adopted the same, as follows:

"John A. Innes, of Easton, Pennsylvania, enlisted September 16, 1861, at Easton, as a private in Company B, Fifty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was discharged August 25, 1862, at New Berne, North Carolina, on surgeon's certificate of disability. He rendered subsequent service during the invasion of Pennsylvania as a volunteer in Company C, Thirty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Militia, from June 30 to August 7, 1863; and again, in Company A, Twenty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, from February 14 to May 23, 1865.

"Mr. Innes contracted hemorrhage of the lungs at the battle of Roanoke, North Carolina, February 8, 1862, was sent to the Hammond general hospital at Beaufort, North Carolina, and was discharged therefrom August 25, 1862, possessed of a seemingly permanent disability in a disease of the heart and lungs. He was, in due course of time, recognized by the Pension Office as a worthy applicant for an invalid pension, and was pensioned at $8 per month, commencing October 20, 1875, and at $18 per month, commencing September 1, 1876. The last payment was made to include December 4, 1877. On December 10, 1877, Innes was dropped from the pension-rolls in consequence of the report rendered by a special agent of the Pension Office, which stated that the disability for which he drew his pension existed prior to enlistment.

"From the very voluminous array of papers submitted with this case, your committee have selected a few, to which they invite the attention of the House in connection with their report.

"The first of these is an anonymous communication, addressed, presumably, to the Commissioner of Pensions, and dated 'Easton, Pennsylvania, October 1, 1877.' The writer signs himself 'An old citizen,' and makes a brief but pointed attack upon the character of Mr. Innes, declaring him not entitled to a pension. The Pension Office, in consequence of this anonymous charge or charges, ordered an investigation, by a special agent, of the case of Mr. Innes, which inquiry resulted in the suspension of the pension as already noted. The second of the selected papers in the case to which your committee especially refer is a letter addressed to the Pension Office, under date of February 7, 1878, by George E. Lemon, Esq., the attorney for claimant, in which is noted the allegation of Mr. Innes that his married sister was the principal witness examined by the special agent in the conduct of his investigation of the case of Mr. Innes, and that her adverse testimony was due to a bitter personal hostility existent between the pensioner and herself. The third particular reference is the combined affidavits of Mrs. Elizabeth Innes, the mother of the claimant, and three intimate friends of the Innes family, who each declare, on oath, that they know that John A. Innes and his married sister have been on unfriendly terms for six years past, the enmity being bitter, and its cause being the fact that the mother of the claimant allows him to occupy, rent free, a house belonging to her.

"Brief reference is now made to the fourth of these papers, wherein is found the evidence given before the special agent by Mrs. Sallie Cornell, the married sister of Mr. Innes. Her testimony is of an indefinite, hesitating character, and tends to show that the idleness of her brother previous to enlistment was induced by lung complaint and laziness. This idea is conveyed in a very doubting, equivocal manner, as a perusal of the evidence must show.

"Attention is now called to the sworn affidavits of Mrs. Elizabeth Innes, mother of the claimant, and of the following-named persons—each and all of them certifying to the entire health of Mr. Innes prior to his enlistment, this being the point on which was based the adverse report to the special agent. The affiants spoken of are: G. B. Slough, M. D., a physician of Easton, Pennsylvania, whose standing in the community is certified to by the prothonotary of the county court; Henry Ludwig, A. F. Hellet, Cornelius Brunner, E. H. Heckman, D. F. Davis, J. H. Genther, and Charles I. Frey, all being residents of Easton, the home of claimant. J. H. Genther was the first lieutenant of Company B, Fifty-first Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, the command in which Mr. Innes served.

"The last of these special papers in this case is a letter written the Pension Office by Frank Reeder, commander of the Pennsylvania department of the Grand Army of the Republic, and dated 'Easton, April 12, 1872.' This is written in commendation of Mr. Innes as an original claimant; but its language can now be quoted as staunch testimony for Mr. Innes. Mr. Reeder says: 'It [the claimant's case] is one of the saddest cases I ever knew of, and one of the most deserving.'

"Beyond this your committee feel it perfectly useless to proceed. They have shown, by the strongest attainable evidence, that the claimant in this case has been debarred his pension by reason of bitter personal hostility, and the very fact that the investigation which resulted in robbing him of his pension was started by an anonymous letter, wherein charges were preferred against the claimant, seems to lend additional coloring to our verdict in the case.

"After a most thorough inspection of the multitude of papers submitted, your committee feel it incumbent upon them—always bearing in mind the equity of the case—to report favorably upon the bill.

"They recommend, therefore, that the said bill do pass."

Mr. COFFROTH. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES R. GORDON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1453) for the relief of James R. Gordon, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. COFFROTH.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of James R. Gordon, late a private in Company D of the Sixteenth Regiment of Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month from the date of his discharge from the military service of the United States, in the late war of the rebellion, on account of disease contracted while in the line of duty in said service.

Mr. BROWNE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "roll," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States."

Mr. COFFROTH. The committee has no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ALBERT O. MILLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1455) granting a pension to Albert O. Miller, introduced by Mr. OVERTON, and reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. COFFROTH.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Albert O. Miller, late a seaman on board the United States steamship Bienville, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. BROWNE. I move to amend the bill by striking out the clause fixing the rate of pension—that is, the words "and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1455) granting a pension to Albert O. Miller, late of the United States Navy, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

That Albert O. Miller enlisted as a seaman in the United States Navy on the 23d day of September, 1864; that on the 15th day of January, 1865, while in such service and in line of duty, he participated in the capture of Fort Fisher; that after the capture of the fort the boats from which he and others had disembarked were found beached and partly filled with sand and water; that an attempt was made to bail the boats and prepare them for use, in which said Miller became drenched with the surf, and that he remained on the beach all night thoroughly wet by the exposure; that in consequence he suffered a severe attack of neuralgia and rheumatism, and that he has since suffered continuously from such rheumatism so contracted up to the present time; that his physical condition is now such by reason of said disease that he requires the regular aid and assistance of some other person, on account of total physical disability; that said Albert O. Miller was honorably discharged from the naval service of the United States; that he has made due and regular application for a pension (naval claim No. 3286) and has fully established his right to a pension of the amount named in the bill, save that he has failed to establish the facts of the time, place, and circumstances under which he contracted his said disability; that on account of such failure his application has been rejected by the Interior Department; that such failure has been by reason of the inability of said Miller to ascertain the whereabouts of his mates, the seamen who were present and had actual knowledge of said facts, and such failure has been notwithstanding diligent efforts on the part of said Miller to ascertain the whereabouts of such persons.

The committee, believing the case to be meritorious, recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move that the bill with the amendment be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PHINEAS GANO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1259) granting a pension to Phineas Gano, introduced by Mr. WILSON, and reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. COFFROTH.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions of the pension laws, the name of Phineas Gano, late a first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster of the Twenty-fifth Regiment Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry, with proportionate pay as first lieutenant to that now received by said Gano as private; said pension as first lieutenant to commence and be paid from the 18th day of July, 1865, the date of the final discharge of said Gano from the military service of the United States, deducting therefrom the amount heretofore received by said Gano on pension as a private.

Mr. WARNER. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom the accompanying bill (H. R. No. 1259) was referred, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

The committee find that Phineas Gano, late first-lieutenant and regimental quartermaster, while a private in Company B, Twenty-fifth Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry, and in the line of duty, contracted rheumatism, which disease was very much aggravated by his continuous field service and consequent exposure as a lieutenant and regimental quartermaster, to which rank he had been subsequently promoted on account of many gallant services.

After his discharge he never recovered from this disability, and the rheumatism gradually became chronic, preventing him from performing manual labor, and, of course, from procuring a subsistence thereby. He was pensioned at the rate of $4 per month, and on applying for an increase he received $6 per month, and subsequently, on the recommendation of Dr. Charter, the examining surgeon of the Pension Department, who reported him as suffering from total and permanent disability as a result of the rheumatism contracted while in the service of the United States, he received $8 per month, the full pension of a private soldier.

It appears that the Pension Department has established a rule by which, when an injury is received or a disability is contracted, a pension is granted only at the rate proportioned to the rank of the soldier at the time of receiving the original injury or contracting the original disability; therefore, although Gano was suffering from total disability and left the service as an officer, the Department would not allow him other than the full pension of a private for total disability, because, as is alleged, the disability was originally contracted while serving as a private soldier.

Whatever may be the policy of this rule it does not seem to work well when applied to the claims of a deserving pensioner. The committee are of opinion that this case should not have been embraced under the rule, inasmuch as the original disability must necessarily have been aggravated by Gano's subsequent service in the higher rank; and as he is now suffering from total and permanent disability, as is shown by the report of the examining surgeon of the Pension Office, it is but just that he should receive the full rate to which his rank entitles him.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of this bill.

Mr. WARNER. I ask that the bill be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BRAGG. Does this bill make provision for the pay of this applicant as an officer independent of his pension?

Mr. WILSON. It simply provides a pension for him as an officer.

Mr. BRAGG. From what committee does this bill come?

Mr. WILSON. From the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BRAGG. Does the Committee on Invalid Pensions have charge of bills providing for the pay of officers of the Army? If I heard the bill correctly, it provides that this person shall in addition to his pension draw pay as an officer for a certain period of time when he had not been properly mustered into the service as such officer. This is a bill relating to the pay of an officer of the Army, and properly belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. I think it is too late to raise such a point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the bill provides for the payment of a pension from the date of discharge at the rate that would have been given him had he been pensioned as a lieutenant, deducting therefrom the pension he has already received as a private.

Mr. BRAGG. It occurred to me that the bill was subject to the other construction.

Mr. COFFROTH. Let the bill be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to amend by striking out the word "pay" and inserting the word "pension;" so that it shall read "with proportionate pension as first lieutenant to that now received by said Gano as private."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARGARET R. COLONOY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4609) granting arrears of pension to Margaret R. Colonoy, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. COFFROTH.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay Margaret R. Colonoy, widow of Josiah B. Colonoy, late major of the First Regiment of Maryland Infantry Volunteers, arrears of pension at the rate of $8 per month, from the 12th day of October, 1864, the death of her husband, to the 22d day of March, 1878, up to which time she was pensioned as the widow of a first lieutenant, and at which time she was placed on the pension-roll as the widow of a major.

Mr. BROWNE. Let the report in this case be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Margaret R. Colonoy, widow of Major Josiah B. Colonoy, First Maryland Volunteers, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

Margaret R. Colonoy, widow of Josiah B. Colonoy, was inscribed on the pension-rolls at the rate of $17 per month from the date of her husband's death, at the rank of first lieutenant. On the 22d of March, 1878, her pension was increased to rate as of the rank of major by special act of Congress. She now claims the difference between the pension of a first lieutenant's widow and that of the widow of a major from the death of her husband to the passage of the special act—to wit, the sum of $8 per month.

It is shown by the records in the case that Josiah B. Colonoy was mustered into the First Maryland Volunteers May 27, 1861, as a first lieutenant and adjutant, and served as such until September 6, 1864, when he was commissioned as major, and died while holding said rank, October 12, 1864, of wounds received in action August 21, 1864.

It is shown by the records in the case that a vacancy existed in the rank of major from May 19, 1864, until December 2, 1864.

Francis M. Smith swears that he was a first lieutenant and adjutant of said regiment, having been promoted to succeed said Colonoy, who was promoted to the rank of major. Said Colonoy was acting as major before and at the time of his being wounded, August 31, 1864, at which date he was sent to hospital in consequence of said wounds. His commission as major was received at the regiment after his removal to hospital, and by reason of said wounds, and without any fault or neglect on his part, he was unable to be mustered on his commission as major.

The committee are of the opinion that the widow is entitled to the arrears, as her pension should have originally been granted to her at the rate of the pensions granted to widows of persons holding the rank of major, and they therefore recommend that the accompanying bill do pass.

Mr. BROWNE. I would inquire if the original pension in this case was by a special act of Congress?

Mr. COFFROTH. It was, and ought to have been at first the pension of a major instead of a lieutenant. This bill covers only four years.

Mr. BREWER. Why was this woman granted a lieutenant's pension instead of a major's pension, if it was granted by Congress?

Mr. COFFROTH. It was a mistake in the bill passed in 1878. The bill was reported for a lieutenant's pension, and General Rice, of Ohio, then the chairman of the committee, afterward discovered the mistake, and at the same session, I believe, introduced a bill increasing the pension, which was not passed.

Mr. BRAGG. I think this bill should not be passed. If we pass this bill we will be doing very great—I do not know exactly what term to use—perhaps I should say very great violence to the military laws as well as the pension laws of the country. If I understand the report correctly, this officer who was pensioned by act of Congress received the wounds for which he was pensioned when he was a lieutenant.

Mr. COFFROTH. No, when he was a major.

Mr. BRAGG. And after he was taken to the hospital, suffering from those wounds, he was commissioned as a major. The rule in regard to pensions is that a person shall be granted the rate of pension which belongs to the rank that he held at the time the injury was received for which he is pensioned.

If we pass this bill we will change the entire system of our pension laws. We will provide, at least in principle, that if a man has been wounded while a lieutenant, which may have been in 1861 or 1862, and subsequently becomes a major-general, he shall draw a major-general's pension under his subsequent commission for wounds received by him when he held a lieutenant's commission. That would be doing injustice to hundreds and thousands of pensioners, and change the entire rule upon which pensions are granted. For that reason it seems to me this bill ought not to pass.

Mr. COFFROTH. I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] that this officer was wounded while acting as major, on the 31st of August, 1864, and was sent to the hospital on account of said wounds and died shortly thereafter.

Mr. STONE. Was he commissioned as major at that time or simply acting as major?

Mr. COFFROTH. Acting as major.

Mr. STONE. He was not commissioned as major?

Mr. COFFROTH. Not at that time.

Mr. BRAGG. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COFFROTH,] I will say that it is always the duty of the senior officer in rank, whether he be a fifth corporal or a major, to take command of the detachment to which he belongs, it may be a major's command, a lieutenant-colonel's command, a colonel's command or a brigadier-general's command. His grade and rank are not changed because for the time being, under the rules regulating military organizations, he is the senior officer in command.

In hundreds of cases colonels commanded brigades; but does that fact make them brigadier-generals under the pension laws? Whoever is the senior officer for the time being takes command of the troops; he is obliged to do it. But that does not change the rank or grade of the officer at all. He simply discharges the duty which attaches to the office he holds. It does not make him a lieutenant-colonel if he be a major, or a colonel if he be a lieutenant-colonel.

Mr. COFFROTH. I desire to inform the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] that this man was commissioned on the 6th of September, 1864. He was wounded August 31, 1864, and a few days afterward was commissioned. After he was commissioned he died from the effects of the wound. A vacancy had occurred in which he was acting until the 6th of September, 1864, when he was commissioned. His death occurred after he had received the commission.

Mr. BRAGG. Of course; but the wound occurred before.

Mr. COFFROTH. But he died from the effects of the wound.

Mr. BRAGG. Of course; and he was entitled to a pension according to the rank which he held when he received the wound.

Mr. BROWNE. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COFFROTH.] It appears that this pension was originally granted by special act of Congress. The pension was originally that of the surviving widow of a lieutenant; but by subsequent act of Congress it was increased to that of the surviving widow of a major.

Now, if we were asked to pass an act to-day for the first time, the bill, according to all the precedents we have been setting ever since the question of pensions has been pending before Congress, would not operate retroactively. We have in every instance struck out in these pension bills all provisions looking toward arrearages. So that, if this were pending to-day as an original question, we would not go back and grant arrearages. At the time of the passage of the act of 1878 arrearages, as a matter of course, would not have been allowed.

Now, what is this proposition? Although as an original act we would not grant arrearages at all, the proposition is that because some years ago we granted a pension of a particular kind and subsequently increased it by special act we shall now make that special act retroactive, so as to take in arrearages.

Mr. COFFROTH. I will explain if the gentleman will yield a moment.

Mr. BROWNE. Certainly.

Mr. COFFROTH. This woman was put on the pension-rolls in 1874 as the widow of a lieutenant, and drew pension at the rate of $17 a month. On the 2d of March, 1878, this special act was passed putting her on the roll as the widow of a major. She now asks for arrears of $8 a month for those four years, being the difference between the pension she received as the widow of a lieutenant and that which she should have received as the widow of a major. She insists that the Commissioner of Pensions made a mistake and that she ought to have been pensioned originally as the widow of a major.

Mr. BROWNE. I understand now that the original pension was granted by the Pension Bureau, and it was under the law the pension of the widow of a lieutenant.

Mr. COFFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWNE. Subsequently, by an act of Congress, the pension was increased to that of the widow of a major. The Pension Office did all it could under the law. This man, according to the report, never was a major; so far as appears from the report he was never entitled to be mustered as a major; and the act of Congress of 1878 was an act of grace. Under the cold letter of the law this widow was not entitled to the relief granted by that act. I do not now controvert the propriety of that legislation; but if we pass this bill it simply gives this woman arrearages which she could not now get under the law—arrearages which would not have been granted to her when the act of 1878 was passed. Why is she any more entitled to arrearages for those years than the fifteen or twenty men and women in whose favor we have passed special bills in Committee of the Whole this afternoon?

I regret to oppose a pension for any person. I believe this is the first time I have done so. But it strikes me that this is simply a proposition to give this widow arrearages of pension after Congress in its magnanimity has put her on the pension-rolls at a rate to which she was not entitled under the general law.

Mr. WARNER. I think it would be quite within bounds to say that there are now on the pension-rolls 10,000 cases in which the pension was granted for the rank held at the time the disability was incurred, although afterward the soldier was advanced in rank. It has been the universal rule, as already explained, that pensions should be granted according to the rank held by the soldier at the time the wound was received. This case, as my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] has said, has been made an exception. Congress has taken it out of 10,000 similar cases and allowed a pension in accordance with a rank not held by the soldier at the time the disability was incurred. Now it is proposed to add arrearages. I think this is one case at least which the Committee of the Whole might very rationally refuse to lay aside for favorable report to the House.

Mr. COFFROTH. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not arrearages, but it is to pay her the difference between what she received and what she was entitled to as the widow of a major who was regularly commissioned and mustered in before his death.

Mr. WARNER. But she was never entitled to that under the law, but only to the pension attached to the rank held by her husband at the time of his disability.

Mr. BROWNE. Do I understand the gentleman to claim, under the circumstances of this case and under the law, that the Commissioner of Pensions should have placed her originally on the pension-roll as the widow of a major?

Mr. COFFROTH. Undoubtedly. Here is the evidence.

Mr. BROWNE. Then I understand the gentleman to insist that one who was never mustered into the United States service with the rank of major was a major?

Mr. COFFROTH. He was commissioned, mustered in, and acted as major before his death. He died within twenty days after receiving this wound. He was wounded on the 21st of August, and he was mustered into service before his death.

Mr. BROWNE. Does the report state he was mustered into the service?

Mr. COFFROTH. I do not know in reference to that, but the fact is that he was mustered in. He was commissioned, and died while holding said rank.

Mr. BROWNE. Does the report state, or is it the fact, that he was ever mustered into the service as major?

Mr. COFFROTH. The report, I believe, does not state, but the fact really is that he was mustered into the service as major.

Mr. STONE. While in the hospital?

Mr. BROWNE. The report gives an excuse why he was not mustered into the service as major.

Mr. COFFROTH. It has been reported to me by the parties that he was mustered in.

Mr. BRAGG. I call attention to the fact that the report states his commission as major was received at the regiment after his removal to the hospital. He never got his commission until after he was wounded.

Mr. COFFROTH. He got it before he died.

Mr. BROWNE. The question I put to the gentleman is this: Was it the duty of the Commissioner to have recognized this man as having been mustered in as a major? Does the gentleman assume it was the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions to have placed on the pension-roll this woman as the widow of a deceased major, he not having been mustered into the service at all? If it is to cure a mistake made by the Commissioner of Pensions, I will vote for the bill.

Mr. COFFROTH. It most undoubtedly is the spirit of the law that the widow should receive the pension of the rank held by her husband at the time of his death.

Mr. BRAGG. Is that the law? Is it not of the rank held at the time he received the disability?

Mr. COFFROTH. Yes, of the rank held by him at the time he received the disability which caused his death.

Mr. BRAGG. Of course.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 5, noes 34.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. No quorum has voted.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope that question will not be raised by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Very well, I will withdraw the division.

Mr. ATKINS. The bill has been defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The noes have it and the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with an unfavorable recommendation.

JOSEPH CARTWRIGHT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3123) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll the name of Joseph Cartwright.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll the name of Joseph Cartwright, late a private of Company G, Twenty-seventh Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill No. 3123, entitled "A bill to grant a pension to Joseph Cartwright," ask leave to submit the following report:

We find from the papers in the original pension case filed in the Pension Office at various times since December 2, 1872, the date of filing the original declaration, that the petitioner enlisted as a private in Company G, Twenty-seventh Ohio Volunteers, August 3, 1861; was mustered into the service August 14, 1861, and was honorably discharged December 23, 1861. The testimony in the case shows that on the 2d of November, 1861, the claimant, with others, was being taken from hospital at Kansas City, Missouri, to join his regiment, the detachment being under command of a strange officer, detailed for the special duty, and whose whereabouts cannot now be ascertained; and while at Little Blue, Missouri, the detachment was attacked by the enemy and claimant, in the fight, was struck by a Minie ball in the forehead; that the ball remained in the wound, he receiving no medical treatment, being a prisoner in the hands of the enemy. He was finally paroled and received his discharge, returning to his home early in December, 1861, when he received medical treatment and the ball removed from the wound. The proof of the facts alleged was placed before the Pension Office as best they could be, and consist of the testimony of comrades who were with the claimant, of an officer who from report knew of the wounding, and from the home physician at Ironton, Lawrence County, Ohio, who removed the ball and rendered claimant medical service on his return to his home. The case was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground of there being "no record and of his inability to furnish satisfactory evidence showing that the wound was received in service and line of duty."

The claimant states that it is utterly impossible to furnish further proof, as the officer before mentioned cannot be found. He therefore appeals to Congress to be pensioned by special act.

While under the pension laws the Pension Office must necessarily require the full amount of proof, and its action in this case seems proper, there is full and sufficient evidence before this committee to prove the merit of the claim. The soldier was in service but a few months at the beginning of the war, when but slight attention was paid to the proper keeping of records. The fact that his discharge was ordered by the War Department shows there were grounds for it. Although the record does not mention the wounding, his comrades present prove his being hit and taken prisoner, and the physician gives evidence as to his relieving him of the ball. In 1873 and again in 1877 examining surgeons of the Pension Office, before whom he was sent, find the claimant disabled from the effects of the wound, one rating him at $6 per month in 1873, the other, in 1877, fixing his degree of disability at $4 per month. Your committee would therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

WYATT BOTTS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 802) granting a pension to Wyatt Botts.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Wyatt Botts, late a private in Company B, Eighty-eighth Regiment Infantry Ohio Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 802) granting a pension to Wyatt Botts, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

We find, upon an examination of the papers originally filed in the Pension Office, that the petitioner enlisted as a private in Company B, Eighty-eighth Ohio Volunteers, on the 14th of August, 1862; was mustered September 24, 1862; was discharged July 3, 1865; and filed his application for pension September 29, 1876. He alleges that he is disabled by disease of the lungs and loss of sight of left eye, contracted at Camp Chase, Ohio, in December, 1862. The testimony shows that the petitioner was a sound man at date of enlistment. That he contracted typhoid fever as alleged is shown by the evidence of his captain. His family physician says "that in the spring of 1863 petitioner was home on furlough for fever and inflammation of the eyes. The lungs were also involved."

The petitioner when called upon by the Pension Office to produce evidence of medical treatment after his discharge, stated his inability to do so up to 1871, but submitted the sworn statement of a man and wife that they had lived with him in the same house from the time of his discharge up to 1871, and that he was constantly suffering from disease of the lungs and eyes and treated himself with patent medicines.

The evidence of a reputable physician is filed in the Pension Office September 29, 1876, to the effect that he had been the family physician of the petitioner for five years prior thereto; that when first called to see him he found him suffering from pulmonary phthisis, from typhoid fever, also loss of one eye, resulting from erysipelas. The records of the War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, show no evidence of alleged disability on the rolls or returns, but show that his company was stationed at Camp Chase December 31, 1862. The evidence of the Surgeon-General's Office shows that he was admitted to Chase general hospital October 31, 1862, and was transferred and admitted again January 5, 1864, with general debility, and returned to duty February 19, 1864. The records of the Surgeon-General give no other information. He was examined by a surgeon of the Pension Office, at Champaign, Illinois, January 20, 1877, who found him not incapacitated from obtaining a subsistence by manual labor, but rated him at $8. His description is as follows: Height, six feet; weight, one hundred and sixty; age, thirty-eight; pulse, eighty-four; respiration, twenty; sight of left eye gone; no apparent sympathetic affection of right eye; slight trouble with lungs and heart.

In a sworn statement petitioner alleges that he can furnish no other evidence as to his disability. The claim was rejected February 27, 1878, by the Pension Office, on the ground "claimant unable to show connection of present disability with the service by medical testimony from discharge to 1871, there being no record of disease alleged."

Your committee believe that, in view of the time which has elapsed, the petitioner may be unable to obtain the testimony which the Pension Office deems necessary to establish his right to a pension under the laws; but your committee is of the impression, from the evidence before it, that the petitioner was disabled while in the service, that he is still disabled, and that his present disability proceeds from disease contracted while in the Army; and they therefore report favorably, and recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 802) granting a pension to Wyatt Botts.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, moved that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES P. HUNTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2773) granting a pension to James P. Hunter.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James P. Hunter, late a private in First Illinois Light Artillery.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions report:

That from an examination of the papers originally filed in the Pension Office, it appears that the petitioner enlisted and was mustered into the United States service in Company F, First Illinois Light Artillery, January 11, 1864, and was discharged on July 10, 1865; that while in the line of duty at Chattanooga, Tennessee, he contracted sore eyes, and was treated in hospital for such disease. The petitioner states in his claim that he is unable to furnish the evidence of the Army surgeon who treated him, as he did not know his name, and that he is unable to furnish the evidence of a commissioned officer of his company at the date of the contraction of his disability. He presents evidence from a number of comrades showing that the disease of the eyes was contracted while the petitioner was doing fatigue duty May 1, 1865, at Chattanooga, Tennessee; also evidence showing his freedom from any disease of the eyes at the time of his enlistment, and the fact of his eyes being sore when he came out of the Army. He was examined by the examining surgeon of the Pension Office January 15, 1873, when he was rated at "one-half" pension for disease of the eyes, which the physician then found as "chronic conjunctivitis with granulated lids." He was examined again April 15, 1879, by another examining surgeon, who found him suffering with disease of the eyes, and rated him at "one-half" disability—$4 per month. The Pension Office declines to admit the case to pension, in the absence of medical evidence of treatment in the service, which the petitioner claims he is unable to furnish for the reasons stated.

Your committee can understand the action of the Pension Office under the law, but is of the impression that the facts and equities of the case indicate the meritorious nature of the claim to pension. The proof is clear that he went into the service free from any disability of the eyes; that he came out of the Army with his eyes affected, and they have continued so affected up to the present time. They therefore believe him entitled to pension, and, in view of the evidence presented, report favorably, and recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 2773) granting a pension to James P. Hunter.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY MILLS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2439) granting a pension to Henry Mills.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Mills, late a private, Company D, of the Ninety-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, to date from the 6th day of July, A. D. 1865.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2439) granting a pension to Henry Mills, having had the same under consideration, ask leave to submit the following report:

That it appears in evidence that Henry Mills enlisted and was mustered into the United States military service on or about the 30th day of August, A. D. 1862, as a private soldier in Company D, Ninety-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry. It also appears that said Mills was in continuous service until July 6, A. D. 1865, at which time he was mustered out of service with his regiment at Camp Bolton, Springfield, Illinois; that said Mills was in sound, robust, and vigorous health at date of muster in, and that he was broken down, his constitution impaired, and had lost the sight of one eye when mustered out.

It further appears in evidence that while in the service and in the line of duty he was taken sick with the measles and sent to hospital; that upon recovering from this disease he was stricken with the small-pox. Upon his recovery from the small-pox, not being able for field duty, he was detailed and retained at the small-pox hospital as an orderly or messenger; he was occupied most of the time in procuring from the general hospital headquarters rations, medicines, and other supplies, and conveying same to the small-pox hospital; that in performing this service he was directed by the surgeon in charge to use a mule team, and in his attempt to secure the mules upon one occasion he was severely kicked upon the side of the head by a mule, and the sight of his left eye was instantly destroyed and has been lost to him ever since. The degree of his disability by reason of the loss of his left eye, and his impaired health caused by the diseases heretofore referred to, is classified by the medical examiner as one-half incapacitated for obtaining his subsistence by manual labor. The disability is declared permanent by the same party.

Your committee believe this to be a worthy and meritorious case, and report said bill back and respectfully recommend that it do pass.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out all after the word "volunteers" in line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "to date from the 6th day of July, A. D., 1865.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the bill, as amended, be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

CAROLINE STIEF.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 853) granting a pension to Caroline Stief.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the name of Caroline Stief, widow of Frederick Stief, late a member of the Missouri militia, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and that her pension shall be paid from and after the 31st day of December, 1870.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions report:

That we find, upon examination of the papers in the pension case originally filed in the Pension Office, that the petitioner is the widow of Frederick Stief, who was a private in Company B, Sixth Battalion Missouri State Militia, and who, in the battle of Boomfield, Missouri, in 1861, was severely injured by being struck in the side by the butt of a musket, from the effects of which injury he suffered continually, and finally demised in Boomfield, Missouri, December 30, 1870; that his widow applied for a pension within a year after his death, and that it was pending in the Pension Office until completed in 1877; that the delay in its completion was caused by the inattention and carelessness of her first attorney, and that the last attorney who had the claim in hand furnished the bulk of the evidence to complete it; that it was rejected in 1877 by the Pension Office, under the third clause of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, which recites that "no claim of this character shall be valid unless prosecuted to a successful issue prior to the 4th day of July, 1874."

Your committee, after examining the testimony and the statement of the petitioner made to them, are constrained to believe that the delay in completing the claim cannot justly be attributed to the petitioner; that she was made the victim of inattention and carelessness on the part of her attorney, and that under all the circumstances of the case she should not be made to suffer.

Under the law the Pension Office was obliged to reject the claim, but your committee deem that it is a proper case for the interposition of Congress. We therefore report favorably upon the petition and recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 853) granting a pension to Caroline Stief.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the word "laws," in line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following:

"And that her pension shall be paid from and after the 31st day of December, 1870."

The amendment was ageeed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the bill, as amended, be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM G. THOMPSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2764) granting a pension to William G. Thompson.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William G. Thompson, son of William G. Thompson, who was a captain in the First Regiment of Massachusetts Artillery, and was killed in the battle of Petersburgh, Virginia, May 20, 1864, and pay him a pension at the rate of $22 per month.

Mr. CRAPO. If the committee will allow me a word it will render unnecessary the reading of the report in this case.

A bill in behalf of this claimant was introduced in the Forty-fifth Congress, and was favorably reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, but did not receive the action of the House. It was introduced very early in this Congress—in the first session of this Congress—and had reasonably prompt attention from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, who reported favorably upon it, and it has been for over fourteen months pending on the Private Calendar without action by the House. This, Mr. Chairman, was a very meritorious case. It was a case of a poor, helpless cripple, whose father was shot dead as Petersburgh. But while we have been delaying action here upon this claim in the transaction of public business——

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry of him?

Mr. CRAPO. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. I understand this bill provides for a pension at the rate of $22 per month?

Mr. CRAPO. Yes, sir. I was going on to say that while we have been delaying, and delaying for three years, action upon a case as meritorious as this, on account of public business, during all of which time this poor boy has been waiting and waiting for some aid from the Government for which his father gave his life, death has intervened and thereby relieved him of his pain and helplessness and the Government from any burden for his support. It is unnecessary now to pass the bill. And that suggests to us, Mr. Chairman, that there should be some method provided by which meritorious cases like this can have more prompt action than they now receive.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts pemit me to ask him why the pension was not granted by the Pension Office?

Mr. CRAPO. The case is this: he did have his pension, but it expired when he became sixteen years of age.

Mr. WARNER. And it requires a special act to renew it, of course.

Mr. CRAPO. The Pension Office could not grant it. It must have been granted, if granted at all, by special act of Congress. But it is now too late.

Mr. WHITE. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts not to want this bill acted upon?

Mr. CRAPO. It is unnecessary now.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that that motion can be made after the committee rises.

Mr. WHITE. Then strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the proper motion would be that it be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be laid upon the table. This will attain the object the gentleman has in view in making the motion.

Mr. WHITE. I am not particular.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to report the bill to the House with a recommendation that it be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN MURPHY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 59) for the relief of John Murphy.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will save the committee the trouble of having this bill read by stating that while it has been pending upon the Calendar the Pension Office has taken up the case and granted the pension. Nothing is now to be asked from Congress. I therefore move that it be reported to the House without recommendation, and when there I will move to lay it on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

AMANDA J. M'FADDEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2075) granting a pension to Amanda J. McFadden, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Commissioner of Pensions be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Amanda J. McFadden, widow of George McFadden, deceased, who received a pension up to his death on account of service and wounds as a soldier of the United States in the Black Hawk war; and that the said Commissioner is hereby directed to pay the said widow all arrearages of pension from the date of the death of her said husband.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. No. 2075, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

We find upon an examination of the papers originally filed in the pension claim of the petitioner at the Pension Office that she is the wife of George McFadden, who was a soldier in the Black Hawk war in 1832, (captain of the Illinois Mounted Volunteers;) that he was wounded by the hostile Indians June 24, 1832; that he was discharged from service June 29, 1832; that he died April 20, 1852; that he was pensioned for his wound, and received such pension up to the time of his death.

The widow's application was filed October 31, 1853, and was completed March 4, 1879. The case was rejected by the Pension Office on the opinion of the medical referee of that office that the disease from which the soldier died was not the result of the wound he received in battle.

Your committee find that the evidence in the case shows that the wound received by the soldier was a gunshot above the ankle, which fractured the bone and caused the leg to become much shorter than the other; the bone was rendered "carious;" and that the wound remained unhealed, and as a running sore, up to a few years before the soldier died.

The evidence of neighbors and associates shows that he was much afflicted, but that his health was better before the wound healed than afterward; that after the healing of the wound his health became very poor, and he was affected in various ways. The medical evidence in the case, as to death, is that of Dr. William W. Fox, submitted May 22, 1879, who says: "While he could not state positively that the death, which occurred in the prime of the soldier's life and while he was under his care, was directly the result of the wound in his leg, he can state that the said wound troubled him a great deal, and did not heal up until a few years previous to his death; and after said wound healed up, his general health never was as good as it was previous. He was troubled with dyspepsia, which was attributable to the healing up of the wound. The dyspepsia continued, and ultimately what seemed to be cancer of the stomach became fully developed, and after a lingering illness caused his death. There is no doubt that had his death not been so hastened he would have continued to receive his pension until the present time."

Your committee, upon the evidence of the facts in the case, are constrained to believe that the death of this soldier was in a manner attributable to his wounding, and that, notwithstanding the technical objection of the Pension Office, the petitioner is properly entitled to the consideration of Congress. They therefore report favorably upon the petition, and recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 2075) granting a pension to Amanda J. McFadden.

Mr. WHITE rose.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I claim the floor as having reported the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "war," namely, the words "and that the said Commissioner is hereby directed to pay the said widow all arrearages of pension from the date of the death of her said husband."

Mr. WHITE. I am appealed to by gentlemen all around me not to oppose this bill. I say with deference to them they do not know anything about it. They are yielding to their hearts instead of following their judgments as legislators.

What is this bill? It is a bill to give a pension to the widow of George McFadden, as to whom the committee report that he was a soldier in the Black Hawk war in 1832, (captain of the Illinois Mounted Volunteers;) that he was wounded by the hostile Indians June 24, 1832; that he was discharged from service June 29, 1832; that he died April 20, 1852. Think of it. He died in 1852. How many years ago? Twenty-nine years ago is it not, or thereabout? Very well; this has been slumbering from that time to this. Why have they delayed making this application all this time?

During the life-time of the deceased soldier he received a pension—that was all right—for a wound he received above the ankle. I have read this report carefully to discover any plausible right in the widow to receive a pension on account of the death of her husband. Her application was made to the Pension Bureau, and they refused it. It is perfectly clear if her husband had died as the consequence of the wound he received, if he had died in 1852 in consequence of a wound received in 1832, she would have received the pension. There is no evidence at all that this death was the consequence of the wound.

An appeal is made to my heart and the hearts of other gentlemen here that this old lady ought to be pensioned because she is an old dependent woman. That is all right. That appeals to my heart. But there is not even plausible evidence here of any connection between the death of the husband and the wound received in 1832. What does the doctor say? The only evidence reported here is the following, being the evidence of Dr. William W. Fox:

While he could not state positively that the death, which occurred in the prime of the soldier's life and while he was under his care, was directly the result of the wound in his leg, he can state that the said wound troubled him a great deal, and did not heal up until a few years previous to his death; and after said wound healed up, his general health never was as good as it was previous. He was troubled with dyspepsia, which was attributable to the healing up of the wound. The dyspepsia continued, and ultimately what seemed to be cancer of the stomach became fully developed, and after a lingering illness caused his death.

I submit there is no evidence here at all showing that this man died as the consequence of the wound. There is an effort to pass this bill allowing large arrearages of pension without any evidence whatever. I for one want to go on the record as being against this bill, and I move that it be reported to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] will be recognized in due time to submit his motion.

Mr. MANNING. I would be glad to appeal successfully to the heart of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I would not desire him to do violence to his judgment. Let him be ever so exacting. Let him look ever so critically into the case. Let him read ever so narrowly what is in the report and what is found much more elaborately in the testimony submitted to the committee. The gentleman read Dr. Fox's testimony in part. He stopped, however, just where he could have found the evidence which he says is wanting.

Mr. WHITE. Where is it? That is what I was looking for.

Mr. MANNING. I will accommodate the gentleman. He has the report in his hand, and he stopped reading at the word "death," just two lines from the bottom of the page. The testimony of Dr. Fox given in the report goes on—

There is no doubt that had his death not been so hastened he would have continued to receive his pension until the present time.

Mr. WHITE. Oh, certainly; if he had not died he would have received the pension to the present time.

Mr. MANNING. That is not what Dr. Fox says. That is the testimony of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE.] Dr. Fox says his death was hastened on account of this wound which he received in the Black Hawk war; and but for his death as the result of this wound he to-day would have been a pensioner of the United States Government.

I submit, if we are going to be just in this matter, we would say it is much more important the pension given to the husband in his life-time should go to the widow, after her support in life is taken from her, than it was that it should go to him in his life-time, she being the beneficiary, as the widow, to a partial extent.

The committee has examined this case; it has reported upon the testimony; and I regard it as highly persuasive and conclusive, if not to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, at least to myself and other members of this House.

But the gentleman says this has been slumbering for twenty years. That is not true. The fact is, immediately after the death of George McFadden this application, in 1853, was made to the Commissioner of Pensions; and it was followed up.

The evidence would develop the facts more fully than they will be found in this report. It shows that one thing after another was required of this widow, and she endeavored to respond. Some of the papers were missing; she was unable to follow the case up, being a widow and in great destitution and living in the distant West, and the case was not concluded until within the past year or so. But is it to be said that because of the lapse of time, because justice is delayed until 1881, therefore it is not to be given at all?

I would suggest to the gentleman that he ought to get upon higher grounds than that of antagonizing the merits of this widow's application when the Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend that she shall have this pension. I have personally examined the papers in this case, and I know there has not been one hour since she filed her application (twenty-six years ago, to be sure) that she has not endeavored as well as she could in her crippled condition, being a woman and not able to prosecute the case with that vigor with which a smart man or an active attorney would have done—not one hour during which she has ever abandoned her cause or permitted it to slumber, as the gentleman says; and I submit that such a statement as he has made is not in accordance with the facts of the case.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MANNING,] I fancy, does not desire to do me injustice, and will not knowingly do his own case injustice. I said, and said truthfully, that this case slumbered for twenty-six years before final action was demanded upon it. The application seems to have been made October 31, 1853. There was no decision made upon the case until March 4, 1879, nearly twenty-seven years.

Mr. MANNING. Let me ask my friend where he gets authority for asserting that there was no action demanded of the Commissioner of Pensions until the past year or so? I beg to inform the gentleman that the contrary is true.

Mr. WHITE. Very well; the presumption is that every man will pursue his rights diligently. Vigilantibus non dormientibus leges subveniunt.

Mr. MANNING. Yes; but there has been no sleepiness on the part of this widow. There has been sleepiness on the part of the Commissioner; but this widow is entitled to the pension because she has been vigilant.

Mr. WHITE. I am glad that the gentleman seems to understand the language which I employed. I repeat that there seems to have been unexcusable negligence in this case, having been left without insisting upon final action or without completing it for twenty-six years. I will read what the report says. I have not time, and we here have not time, to go through all the evidence in the case, and I will refer to the epitome of the evidence contained in the report:

The widow's application was filed October 31, 1853, and was completed March 4, 1879.

Mr. MANNING. By the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. WHITE. One moment. It does not say, "by the Commissioner;" it says "was completed March 4, 1879." I assume that the final evidence was completed in 1879, but I will not be hypercritical about that. I do not care whether it was completed at that time by the action of the Commissioner or of the applicant. It was inexcusable and unexplained negligence.

The case was rejected by the Pension Office on the opinion of the medical referee of that office that the disease from which the soldier died was not the result of the wound he received in battle.

First we have this evidence of negligence, and then we have this positive testimony.

Mr. MANNING. No; the positive testimony is from the physician attending this soldier in his last illness, and is directly against the position which the gentleman takes.

Mr. WHITE. One moment. If the gentleman will restrain his impatience he will understand my position. I say that, in addition to this negligence, we have the positive statement of the medical referee of the Pension Bureau that the death of this soldier was not the result of the wound he received in battle. Is not that correct?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That is merely an opinion.

Mr. WHITE. Very well; what does the judge give when he charges a jury or discharges an application for a rule or makes a decree? It is but the recording of the opinion of the magistrate. So this is the positive opinion of the medical referee that the death was not the result of the wound.

I see nothing in the report in this case to overthrow the evidence of the careful examination, and the final and proper decision which the Pension Office seems to have made in this case; and with all deference to the gentleman from Mississippi who is representing his constituents——

Mr. MANNING. No, not my constituent at all; she lives in Illinois.

Mr. WHITE. Very well. The heart of the gentleman has been moved, possibly, by the appeals made to him—and I do not blame him for it; I compliment him for it—by the appeals made to him on behalf of this old lady by some of her friends. But I submit that those appeals should not be allowed to overcome the positive testimony in the case. There is no evidence here that would justify us in overthrowing the decision of the Pension Bureau, and therefore I have made the motion which I have submitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is upon the amendment to the bill proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] The Clerk will read the portion of the bill which it is proposed shall be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that the said Commissioner is hereby directed to pay the said widow all arrearages of pension from the date of the death of her said husband.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I desire to add to my motion that in lieu of the words stricken out there shall be inserted the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. WHITE. How will the bill then read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Commissioner of Pensions be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Amanda J. McFadden, widow of George McFadden, deceased, who received a pension up to his death on account of service and wounds as a soldier of the United States in the Black Hawk war, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE,] that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with an adverse recommendation.

The motion of Mr. WHITE was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I now move that the bill, as amended, be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN T. NEALE.

The next buisiness on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3309) for the relief of John T. Neale.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to inscribe upon the permanent pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John T. Neale, an employé of the Provost-Marshal-General's Department in 1861, for a pension, payable at the rate prescribed by law for the loss of a leg below the knee-joint by an enlisted man in the Army in actual battle, said pension to commence from the 11th day of September, 1861: Provided, That from the arrears due hereunder there shall be deducted the sum heretofore paid him, the aforesaid John T. Neale, by the Secretary of the Treasury, pursuant to the act for his relief approved March 3, 1879.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom were referred House bill No. 3309 and the petition accompanying it of John T. Neale, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

We find that the petitioner was late an employé of the Provost-Marshal's Department, and has heretofore been before Congress in the character of a petitioner for benefit of the pension law. The case has been examined by committees of both Houses of Congress, and your committee, after examining the papers in the case and the reports heretofore submitted, find that said Neale came to Washington in 1861 as a member of a company of engineers, attached to the Seventy-ninth New York Volunteers, better known as the "Seventy-ninth Highlanders," Colonel James Cameron. There was no law permitting an infantry regiment to embody a company of engineers, and all those composing said company were disappointed in their desire to join the Army. Neale, a veteran of the Mexican war, having come to fight, made a personal appeal to Hon. Simon Cameron, Secretary of War, who sent Neale to General Andrew Porter for employment, if possible. General Porter, being in need of courageous and experienced scouts, enrolled Neale.

The evidence sustains the following facts: that John T. Neale, a citizen of the State of New York, at the outbreak of the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, enrolled himself in a volunteer company raised for the service in the Engineer Corps; that the company thus raised and in which he was enrolled not being accepted by the Government, he tendered his services to Brigadier-General Andrew Porter, provost-marshal of the District of Columbia, by whose authority he was assigned to duty, bearing arms as a scout and detective, acting in conjunction with regularly organized armed forces of the United States; that while in the performance of such duties, and while under the immediate orders of General W. W. Averill assistant adjutant-general of the Provost-Marshal's Department, and on the occasion being mounted on an unruly and unmanageable horse, the property of the Government, and used by said Neale in the discharge of duties to which he had been assigned by orders aforesaid, said Neale was thrown against a rock by said horse, near Long Bridge, in the State of Virginia, then one of the States in rebellion against the Government, and so injured and wounded thereby as to crush his leg above the ankle, by reason of which wound and injury amputation of the fractured limb was necessitated, and the said Neale was rendered a cripple for life. The amputation of said limb was performed by a surgeon in the United States Army, at the United States General Hospital in the city of Washington, on the 11th day of September, 1861, about the date of the wound and injury. These facts are shown by the testimony of General Andrew Porter, Provost-Marshal General; General W. W. Averill, assistant adjutant-general of that department of the military service; and J. W. Gawley, assistant surgeon, United States Army, then in charge of said hospital. On the 28th day of February, 1876, General Averill addressed a letter to Hon. S. S. COX, who introduced said bill, from which your committee quote the following:

"Mr. Neale was a zealous, daring man, who was employed on special duty in the Provost-Marshal-General's Department in 1861, and lost a leg while performing his duty, and something should be done for him."

It also appears that Mr. Neale at one time sought relief under the pension laws by application for pension in due form to the Commissioner of Pensions. His application was rejected, because there is no provision in the general pension law for a pension to a person not a regularly-enlisted soldier except for wounds or injury received in battle, and because he did not receive the injury which resulted in his disability in battle.

Mr. Neale subsequently sought relief by a bill for pension (H. R. No. 1833) first session Forty-first Congress, which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; but as its passage would conflict with paragraph 3, section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, relating to pensions, and limits the time for the admission of claims of this character, that committee did not recommend the passage of said bill.

Your committee submit that while it is true that under the pension laws there is no relief afforded in this case, and that relief can only be obtained by special act of Congress, this case is of such a just and meritorious character as to entitle Mr. Neale to the relief asked for in the bill. The fact that he was not a regularly enlisted soldier, and did not receive the injury which resulted in his disability in battle, ought not to deprive him of the relief sought if he was in the discharge of the duties to which he had been assigned by competent authority in acting in conjunction with regularly organized armed forces of the United States, and that while in the performance of said duties and under the orders aforesaid the wound or injury was received, which facts are abundantly sustained by the testimony.

In view of the facts stated, and that the injury was incurred in the faithful performance of duty at the theater of war, within the boundaries of a rebellious State; that Mr. Neale has also rendered honorable service to his country as a soldier in the Mexican war; that he is aged and is permanently disabled by said injury so as to be unable to pursue any active duty, and that a similar case may not arise, your committee believe that the relief asked for should be granted as a matter of justice to a man in declining years, rendered helpless for life by reason of injuries received while in the faithful discharge of his duty to his country; and therefore report said bill (H. R. No. 3309) and recommend the passage of the same.

Mr. WHITE. I move to amend this bill by striking out all after the word "battle" down to the word "provided." This will strike out the provision for the payment of arrearages of pension. I see that the bill refers to an act heretofore passed for the relief of this man. Does any gentleman know what that act provided?

Mr. MASON. I have prepared and send to the desk an amendment which I think will meet the gentleman's views. It is in the form of a substitute for the whole bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment sent up by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MASON] will be read, after which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE,] if he so desires, will be entitled to recognition upon his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls, subject to provisions and limitations of the pension laws, as an enlisted private, the name of John T. Neale, late a scout under General Andrew Porter, provost-marshal of the District of Columbia, in the war for the suppression of the rebellion."

Mr. WHITE. As the committee will observe, the pending bill makes reference to an act passed in 1879. I have that act before me and will read it:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay unto John T. Neale, late an employé of Brigadier-General Andrew Porter, provost-marshal of the District of Columbia, (by whom said John T. Neale was assigned to duty as a special detective police officer, and sustained an injury while engaged in said service which resulted in making him a cripple for life,) out of any moneys in the public Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal in amount to that which he would have been entitled to had said John T. Neale been an enlisted man in the Army, for a permanent specific disability, to wit, the loss of one leg below the knee-joint; and that said amount be computed in accordance with the present allowance for such disability, to date from the 11th day of September, 1861.

This man did get arrearages, it seems.

Mr. MYERS. He is not now asking for arrears, but to be placed permanently on the pension-roll.

Mr. WHITE. I do not understand clearly the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MASON.]

The CHAIRMAN. It will be again read.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. WHITE. That is all right. I withdraw my amendment.

The amendment of Mr. MASON was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I move that the bill, as amended, be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw that motion and yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have promised to yield first to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CONVERSE.]

THOMAS WORTHINGTON.

Mr. CONVERSE. I ask the Committee of the Whole by unanimous consent to take up the case of poor old Tom Worthington, on page 62 of the Calendar. Its consideration will detain the committee but a moment. He is now between seventy and eighty years of age, and can enjoy his pension only a short time. He saved the fortune of Shiloh.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] will be agreed to.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6291) granting a pension to Thomas Worthington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is instructed to place the name of Thomas Worthington, late colonel Forty-sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-rolls, and that he be entitled to a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the reading of the report demanded?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report, which is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Worthington, late colonel of the Forty-sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, having had the same under consideration, would respectfully report:

That Colonel Worthington graduated with distinction at West Point July 1, 1827, and was appointed brevet second lieutenant of artillery, and resigned October 15, 1828. His resignation was accepted to take effect December 31, 1828. In March, 1846, he re-entered the military service, and aided in raising Company D, Second Ohio Volunteer Infantry, for the Mexican war, and was elected its captain July 3, 1846. He was subsequently appointed adjutant of the regiment. It appears that he got leave of absence September 1, 1846, for two months, and was unable to return within the time by reason of sickness, but was granted an honorable discharge to take effect from January 1, 1847.

July 29, 1861, he was authorized by the Secretary of War to raise and organize a regiment of volunteers, and he became colonel of the regiment January 30, 1862. His regiment was in the battle of Shiloh, 6th and 7th of April, 1862, and rendered valuable service in resisting the assault of the enemy on the extreme right of the Federal Army. He was arrested in August, 1862, and tried by court-martial and found guilty of intoxication and printing certain extracts from his diary, and was sentenced to be cashiered; but subsequently, on the 8th of January, 1867, the Secretary of War revoked the sentence of dismissal, and directed Colonel Worthington to be honorably discharged from the service on tender of resignation to date November 21, 1862, to which date he had been paid. This appears to have been done on the recommendation of General Grant. He was accordingly honorably discharged the service. He published a book of tactics in April, 1862, which was very useful to the western troops. His services at Shiloh were undoubtedly of great utility. He is now old, helpless, and very poor. Your committee believe, in view of all the facts and circumstances, that the Government ought to grant him a pension of $30 a month, and therefore they report a bill for that purpose and recommend its passage.

Before the reading of the report was concluded,

Mr. BARBER moved that the further reading of the report be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BREWER. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. HUNTON. I hope the gentleman will yield to me a moment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] who made the original motion yields to me.

Mr. BREWER. I cannot yield. There are half a dozen other gentlemen desiring the same thing.

Mr. TALBOTT. I wish to bring up a bill which was before the House only a day or two ago, and was carried over on account of one objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] moves that the committee rise. If gentlemen do not desire that the committee should rise, the remedy is to vote down the motion.

Mr. BRIGHT. Before that motion is put, I wish to state that the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] chairman of the Committee on War Claims, desires unanimous consent to take up the bill reported from his committee allowing claims under the act of 1864. It is important the bill should be passed promptly and go to the Senate, so that the Committee on Claims there may investigate these cases and put the bill on its passage.

Mr. BREWER. I withdraw my motion.

CLAIMS REPORTED BY TREASURY ACCOUNTING OFFICERS.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I ask, by unanimous consent, to take up for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. No. 6717) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department. The amendments reported from the Committee on War Claims are clerical, in order to make the bill conform to the report of the accounting officers of the Treasury, save one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will indicate the page of the Calendar where the bill is to be found.

Mr. BRAGG. The bill is to be found on the last page of the Calendar. The one amendment other than clerical is that allowing a claim at $800 instead of $575. The reason of that amendment is this: The accounting officers find the property taken to be of the value of $800. They certify the loyalty of the party and that the property was taken for the use and was used by the Army; but the quartermaster's jurisdiction did not extend beyond the line of Tennessee, and one mule and one horse were over the line. So a portion of the property was across the line in Mississippi, and they find its value, but say they are prevented from taking jurisdiction of it further than making report to Congress for its action.

Mr. WHITE. Will my friend answer me a question?

Mr. BRAGG. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. Am I to understand that this mule was started from Tennessee? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRAGG. I think the gentleman mistakes me. I should have said, if I had spoken my views on the subject, that mules are very apt to start from Pennsylvania and go to Tennessee and elsewhere. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRIGHT. I move the further reading of the bill be dispensed with, as it is a very voluminous one.

Mr. BRAGG. That is true; the bill is a very long one, and I move to dispense with its reading.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAGG. I now move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments will be considered as agreed to, and the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass as amended.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Subsequently, on motion of Mr. BRAGG, the accompanying report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the letter of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, dated ——— —, 1880, transmitting a list of claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States as allowed under the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, respectfully report:

That this committee prepared a bill from the list so transmitted, and reported the same to the House, (H. R. No. 6717), and the same was printed and recommitted to this committee.

That this committee has carefully compared the said bill with the record of the cases allowed, and find many errors therein, and report the bill back with sundry amendments.

The amendments to the bill, in so far as they apply to the payment of claims, are simply to correct errors in spelling, errors in name, and in some few instances errors in amount, and in the description of the person when the allowance is to a person in a representative capacity.

In no case has there been any change from the amount actually allowed by the accounting officers, except in the case of Richard H. Parham, jr.—lines 1533 and 1534 of the original bill.

The accounting officers report an allowance of "$517," while the amendment of the committee makes the allowance of "$800."

The reasons for this additional allowance are these: by an examination of the record from the office of the Quartermaster-General it will be seen that the finding of that Department finds the value of the quartermaster's stores belonging to the claimant and taken and used by the Government to be $800; and they find all the other conditions to exist which entitle him to payment of the whole amount, save one, and that one is a question of jurisdiction, and affects two items of his claim, to wit, one mule worth $100, one horse worth $125 = $225.

The question of jurisdiction was, in the opinion of your committee, correctly determined by the Quartermaster-General, and these two items were rejected from the amount otherwise found claimant's due.

The question of jurisdiction arises under the terms of the act conferring certain jurisdiction upon the Quartermaster's Department to determine claims for property taken and used in certain defined territory. (See act of July 4, 1864.)

This claimant was a resident of Tennessee, and all the property for which he made claim, except these two items, was taken in Tennessee; the horse and mule, though belonging to the claimant, as found by the Department, were, in fact, taken beyond the Tennessee line and within the State of Mississippi, and that Department held rightly, as we think, that they could not, under the act of July 4, 1864, make allowance for these items.

But the Quartermaster's Department having found all the facts in favor of the claimant and against the Government, and the whole case being before us for revision, where the jurisdictional question is not binding and conclusive, the committee deemed it but simple justice to correct the allowance, and give the claimant the amount found his due.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

The amount appropriated by this bill is $251,108.72.

PAYMENT OF CERTAIN AWARDS.

Mr. BRAGG. I wish to ask unanimous consent to take from the Calendar a bill (H. R. No. 6248) directing the payment of certain awards in favor of parties therein named. The total amount appropriated by this bill is $9,563.65. The awards were made by a military board organized by Major-General George H. Thomas for the purpose of appraising the value of property taken from Union citizens of East Tennessee and used by the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is before the committee.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move to dispense with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I ask that the bill be read, so we may know what we are voting on.

The bill was read, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the following-named persons in the State of Tennessee, the sums found to be due them by a court of claims created by Major-General George H. Thomas, in the year 1864, composed of Colonel H. C. Gilbert, of the Nineteenth Michigan Regiment of United States Volunteers, as president, and Captain Hubbard, Lieutenant Colville, Dr. John B. Armstrong, and S. L. Colville, members, to wit:

J. M. Bragg, $323; R. C. Belcher, $259.60; John G. Brown, $65; Will Cummings, $125; J. Collier, $120; Stephen Cope, $15.20; G. P. Cummings, $180.50; Nancy Clendennin, $63; John Evans, $25.60; W. R. Eddings, $10; James M. Evans, $260; George Flanegan, $533; W. Faulkner, $75; Robert Gamble, $98.60; Micajah Gillettine, $52.50; Isaac Grizzel, $102; John H. Hopkins, $110; Tempa Hays, $198; Dickson Hillier, $73.20; J. Hooten, $100; J. A. Jones, $264.84; Jesse Locke, $125; Cyrus Lytle, $110; Thomas B. Locke, $522; G. C. Moffitt, $277; J. and G. R. Macon, $471; J. E. Medley, $270.80; G. P. Moffit, $338; Andrew W. Martin, $32.40; G. W. McDaniel, $100; Thursay A. Nebbit, $30; J. Purser, $57; Harden Patterson, $188.75; Lucinda Plumly, $570; Watson Riggs, $97.80; William Reader, $24; Samuel Ramsey, $423; G. W. Ramsey, $10; James R. Shelton, $150; Thomas Stegall, $32; W. R. Stegall, $85; A. Stone, $292; Malinda Stipes, $89.50; J. M. Smallman, $25; Moses Sparkman, $240; W. O. Smith, $68; Henry Thomas, $272.40; B. C. Thomas, $280; Nathan Wheeler, $250; Edward B. Wheeler, $354.66; Henry E. Ward, $75; Matilda Young, $141.20; Le Roy T. Fustan, $161.10; Dial Brown, $15; Rachael Hennesse, $125;

The said several sums so awarded being in full for quartermaster and commissary stores taken and used by the United States Army from the said persons respectively, and the receipt of the same shall be taken and accepted in such case as a full and final discharge of the several claims so examined and allowed by the said military board.

Subsequently, on motion of Mr. BRAGG, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3510) directing the payment of certain awards in favor of parties therein named, submit the following report:

It appears from the records and evidence in reference to the subject-matter of this bill, obtained from the War Department and filed in this case, that Major-General George H. Thomas, commanding the Department of the Cumberland, on the 8th day of February, 1864, issued the following order, namely:

"[Special Field Orders No. 39.—Extract.]

"HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE CUMBERLAND,
"Chattanooga, February 8, 1864.

"XVI. A board of claims, consisting of four officers and two citizens, is hereby appointed to meet at McMinnville, Tennessee, to fix the damage sustained by loyal citizens of that vicinity by military occupation.

"Colonel H. C. Gilbert, Nineteenth Michigan Infantry; Captain John W. Moore, Twenty-third Missouri Infantry; Captain Charles M. Hubbard, Nineteenth Michigan Infantry; Mr. Samuel L. Colville; Mr. James M. Thompson; Lieutenant Henry A. Forde, Nineteenth Michigan Infantry, recorder.

"The board will meet at the call of the president.

"By command of Major-General Thomas.

"W. D. WHIPPLE,
"Assistant Adjutant-General."

This order was issued in pursuance of the policy of the Government recognizing individuals who were public enemies by laws of war by reason of their residence as friendly to the Government for the purpose of encouraging a sentiment of loyalty to the Federal Government within the insurrectionary territory.

Before any proceedings were had under the order, except the receipt of claims for adjudication, a supplementary order was issued as follows:

"[Special Field Order No. 81.—Extract.]

"HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT CUMBERLAND,
"Chattanooga, March 21, 1864.

"XI. The following-named officers and citizens are relieved from further duty as members of the board of claims instituted by Par. XVI, S. F. O. No. 39, (C. S.) from these headquarters: Captain J. W. Moore, Twenty-third Missouri Infantry; Lieutenant H. A. Ford, Nineteenth Michigan Infantry; Mr. J. P. Thompson.

"XII. The following-named officers and citizens are detailed as members of the board of claims instituted by Par. XVI, S. F. O. No. 39, (C. S.) from these headquarters: Major E. A. Griffin, Nineteenth Michigan Infantry; Lieutenant Leroy Cahill, Nineteenth Michigan Infantry; Dr. John B. Armstrong.

"By command of Major-General Thomas.

"W. D. WHIPPLE,
"Assistant Adjutant-General."

The docket of cases heard by and before this board and the awards made therein, obtained from the War Department and filed as a part of this case, shows that there was filed with such board for hearing one hundred and ninety claims.

The hearing before the board commenced March 28, 1864, and seems to have been concluded April 18, 1864; and there was awarded for quartermaster stores and commissary supplies to the several persons included and named in this bill the sums which the bill provides shall be paid to them respectively.

The committee do not regard the payment of these awards as a question submitted to their decision upon the original facts on which the awards are based. They have been determined and allowed by a military board, called under the apparent sanction of the Government, and whose action seems to have been approved not only by the major-general commanding, but by the War Department, and they have not been paid. The committee use the term "seem to have been approved," because the papers and records remaining in that Department show no disapproval, which may be said to be a negative pregnant, almost as strong as affirmative proof.

This board was composed of officers in actual service whose sympathies may not be suspected of leaning overmuch to the claimants. It held its sessions in the vicinage of the claimants, and its facilities for proof were better than any civil tribunal that has been constituted to hear such claims; and your committee think its findings are entitled to credit.

It may be said, in addition, the Government afterward furnished tribunals to hear this class of claims. These claimants, presumably relying on the awards made by this board, have not prosecuted their claims elsewhere, and statutes of limitations have run against them. But the committee do not care to rest the allowance on an estoppel in pais or anything analogous to it. They prefer to stand upon the awards made as an adjudication of a court created by authority of the Government to hear and adjudicate claims of individuals against it and to hold such adjudications not formally disapproved by the authority convening the court as final.

But the committee find that the bill is incorrect and does not conform accurately to the awards made, and therefore report a substitute for the entire bill and recommend the passage of the substitute.

Mr. BRAGG. I move the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM R. WILMER.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration at this time a bill (H. R. No. 301) for the relief of William R. Wilmer.

There was no objection.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury in adjusting the accounts of William R. Wilmer, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Maryland, to credit him with the sum of $1,813.54, that being the amount in value of internal-revenue stamps and cash of which the safe in his office was robbed by burglars on the night of the 27th of April, 1875, and which have not been recovered: provided it shall appear to the satisfaction of said Secretary that said Wilmer was robbed without any collusion or privity on his part.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 201) for the relief of William R. Wilmer, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Maryland, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

William R. Wilmer was appointed collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Maryland, on the 1st day of May, 1872, and continued in said office until the 1st day of January, 1876, and during said term had his office at Saint Denis, in the county of Baltimore.

On the night of April 27, 1875, his office was entered by burglars, and his safe blown open and robbed of United States beer-stamps of the value of $5,446.75; cigar stamps, $581.25; tobacco-stamps, $18; cash, $1,026.66; in all, $7,072.66; the property of the Government.

Immediately on the discovery of the robbery he telegraphed the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to send some person to investigate the case, which was done, and a thorough investigation made by an agent, who reported the facts to the Commissioner, and acquitted the collector of all fault. Wilmer offered a reward of $1,000 for the recovery of the property and the conviction of the burglars, and at once placed the matter in the hands of experienced detectives. Suspected parties were several months afterward arrested in New York, in whose possession was found a large portion of the stamps, amounting in value to $5,250.12, which were recovered.

The committee find that the robbery was perpetrated through no fault, collusion, or privity of said Wilmer, and in consequence of no want of reasonable diligence or care on his part for the protection of the property; that he made every proper effort for its recovery, in doing which he subjected himself to considerable personal sacrifice and expense. He stands charged on the books of the Internal Revenue Office with $1,813.54, which is the difference between the amount stolen and that recovered, and can obtain no settlement of his account without paying that amount from his private funds, unless the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to credit him with it.

The committee are of the opinion that, under the established policy of Congress to furnish relief in cases of loss occurring in such manner, he is entitled to the redress which he seeks, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

EMMA A. PORCH.

Mr. BREWER. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. PHILIPS. I wish to appeal to the gallantry of the House for just two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan that there are two or three gentlemen on each side of the House who have been promised recognition if the motion to rise is not made. Recognition will be equally bestowed on the two sides of the House.

Mr. BREWER. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. PHILIPS. I ask to take up for action at this time a bill (H. R. No. 4367) granting a pension to Emma A. Porch.

There was no objection.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Emma A. Porch, of Cole County, Missouri, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4367) to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Emma A. Porch, of Cole County, Missouri, beg leave to report:

That the committee find that Mrs. Porch during the war was employed by the military authorities of the Federal Army as dispatch-bearer and spy; that in this capacity she was most active, and rendered important and valuable service to the Army of the Department of Missouri. The Government recognized these services, and Congress, by special act approved June 14, 1878, paid her a moderate compensation therefor, after many years of impatient waiting. The evidence submitted to the committee from her neighbors, the county officials, and her attending physicians, abundantly establishes the fact that when she entered into the military service she was and had always been possessed of a robust constitution and perfect health; that during her said military service she was much exposed to hunger, cold, and rain; that since the war her physical strength and health have been greatly impaired, and have continued to decline, until a few years ago she was stricken with paralysis, which has partially destroyed the use of one side. She is now quite nigh helpless and unable to work, and is a subject of charity, being without any property of consequence, and in constant need of medicine and medical treatment.

You committee think her case appeals most strongly to the Government, which she served with such heroic spirit and fortitude in the day of its need, to help her now in her infirmity resulting from military services. No good reason is apparent for her exclusion from the bounty of the Government because she was not an enlisted soldier. Her sex prevented the enlistment, but it enabled her to gain access to the enemy, to pass safely by and through their lines, and thereby to render to the Government a service as valuable as the soldier who bore a musket. Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. PHILIPS moved the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER. I give notice that I shall hereafter insist upon following the Calendar in its regular order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WHITE. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I hope that motion will not be pressed. I would like to ask unanimous consent to make a statement not exceeding one minute.

Mr. WARNER. I insist on following the Calendar, and shall not yield to anybody for any motion that attempts to take up a bill out of the regular order as they come upon the Calendar.

Mr. WHITE. That being the case, I insist upon the motion that the committee do now rise. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the present attitude of business before the committee as well as the several motions which are being made and in their order. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois in pursuance of a statement that he would alternate between the sides to ask——

Mr. WARNER. Is this the first bill on the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. For consideration of a bill out of its order.

Mr. WARNER. Then I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Pending that the gentleman from Ohio interposes an objection; and pending that objection the gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HASKELL. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HASKELL. When the Chair stated his proposition, and he did state it after or before one or two gentlemen were recognized, he stated that if he was allowed to do so he would recognize gentlemen according to promise. Unanimous consent was then and there given to do so. I hold now that the objection of the gentleman from Ohio comes too late; that the consent was given and the committee is bound by it. That being the case, the recognition of the Chair which has been given to the gentlemen from Illinois on this side of the House must hold.

Mr. WARNER. I make my objection without reference to the side of the House to which recognition is to be given, whether the proposition comes from this or the other side.

Mr. HUNTON. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUNTON. I wish to inquire whether this committee will rise now in face of the fact that the Chair has stated that a partial agreement which received the unanimous indorsement of the committee——

Mr. MORRISON. To which objection ought not now to be made.

Mr. HUNTON. And the departure from that agreement will cut off a pension to a poor old colored man who lost two legs in the service of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, in response to the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia, would state that he had indicated an intention to recognize one or two gentlemen on the other side, and would be very glad if he could be permitted to make perfect the recognition promised. But the Chair is bound to hold that the motion that the committee rise is always in order and must be recognized by the Chair.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I understand that the motion that the committee rise is withdrawn.

Mr. WHITE. It is withdrawn with the understanding that the gentleman from Ohio does not insist upon his objection.

The CHAIRMAN. If the motion is withdrawn the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WHITE. What does the gentleman from Ohio say?

Mr. WARNER. I have said all I desire to say, and that is that I do not withdraw my objection. I have taken that position advisedly. I am opposed to passing bills in this way, and I insist that we go by the Calendar in the regular order of the bills.

Mr. ATHERTON. Then I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that, having made the agreement prior to the objection of the gentleman from Ohio, and having recognized the gentleman from Illinois to offer a bill for consideration, the Chair will permit the title of the bill to be read, after which objection will be asked for. The Clerk will report the title of the bill to which the gentleman from Illinois refers.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 752) granting an increase of pension to Crafts J. Wright.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARNER. I object.

Mr. WHITE. Then I renew the motion that the committee now rise.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I insist it is now too late to object. This agreement which has been made by consent of the committee is now being carried out.

The CHAIRMAN. However much the Chair's inclination may lead him to carry out his recognition, he is compelled to recognize the motion that the committee rise. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WARNER. In view of the fact—[cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is that the committee rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 54.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ATHERTON. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I want to understand how far this agreement is to go. Does it extend to anybody else than one or two gentlemen on the other side to whom promises have been made?

The CHAIRMAN. There have been three recognitions since the regular order on the Calendar was abandoned, but one of these was for the purpose of transacting business in which the party moving for recognition had no personal interest, and therefore that, the Chair supposes, should not be counted. There have been two recognitions—to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] and the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHILIPS.]

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. Now, let us have two on this side.

Mr. WARNER. I made my objection without any knowledge of any arrangement whatever between the Chair and the two sides of the House. I objected on principle to jumping away from the order on the Calendar to requests for unanimous consent. But if there was an arrangement of that kind and my objection would interfere with it, I will yield just to allow two cases, that there may be fairness.

Mr. HUNTON. Let the recognitions be continued till I get through my bill for the colored man.

CRAFTS J. WRIGHT.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I call up the bill (S. No. 752) granting an increase of pension to Crafts J. Wright.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Crafts J. Wright, late colonel Thirteenth Regiment Missouri Volunteers, a pension at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of that which he now receives, to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] is now recognized.

Mr. HUNTON. I understood I was next on the list of recognitions.

The CHAIRMAN. Not of the recognitions on the side to the left of the Chair.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. Has the Chair asked the consent of the committee to take up these bills out of their order? I have been waiting all afternoon for an opportunity to call up a bill on behalf of a friend who is now in the gallery and looking down upon us.

The CHAIRMAN. We will reach the gentleman's friend in the gallery, if possible. [Laughter.]

REBECCA REYNOLDS.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I call up the bill (H. R. No. 6423) granting an increase of pension to Rebecca Reynolds.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, to increase the pension of Rebecca Reynolds, widow of the late Rear-Admiral William Reynolds, from $30 to $50 a month, said increase to take effect from and after the passage of this act; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay to the said Rebecca Reynolds the sum of money necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER. Now I insist there shall be no more granting of requests for unanimous consent. I yielded for the two recognitions on the other side to make it fair.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask that the bill which I hold in my hand, the bill (H. R. No. 4761) granting a pension to George Foster, be read. I am sure no human being would object to it if he understood the case.

Mr. WARNER. Is that the next bill on the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed it is not.

Mr. WARNER. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the business on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report sundry bills to the House with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

The SPEAKER. Two bills reported by the Committee of the Whole on a former Friday have not been acted on by the House. The Clerk will read the title of the first of those bills.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 936) relinquishing the right of the United States to an island therein named.

The SPEAKER. This bill last Friday was laid over by agreement.

Mr. THOMAS. It was laid over at my request. An examination of the facts in the case has convinced me there is really no substantial objection to its passage inasmuch as all rights are reserved by the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

A bill (H. R. No. 1563) for the relief of Mrs. Fannie S. Conway, of Louisville, Kentucky.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The amount named in this bill, $700, is not the proper amount. It ought to be $270. The amount named in the bill is there by mistake. I ask that the bill be amended by substituting $270 for $700.

Mr. KERNAN. I am authorized by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 156) in relation to the international exhibition of 1883, to report it without amendment. I think it will take but a moment to pass the joint resolution; and I venture to ask unanimous consent that it be acted upon now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. MORGAN. I am directed by the Select Committee to take into consideration the state of the law respecting the ascertaining and declaration of the Result of the Elections of President and Vice-President of the United States, to say that in view of the very few legislative days of the session remaining they are of the opinion that it will not be of any value to consider the measures that are now pending before that committee any further during the present session, unless the Senate should be pleased otherwise to direct. The committee feel very anxious, indeed, to bring forward some propositions for the consideration of the Senate in reference to this very important subject, but feel that their effort would be entirely in vain if they should attempt to do so at this late day of the session.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HEREFORD. I ask leave to introduce a bill, and in connection with it I wish to have read a joint resolution of the Legislature of West Virginia.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA,
Office of Clerk of the House of Delegates.

Joint resolution No. 6, instructing our Senators and requesting our Representatives in Congress to introduce a bill ceding to the State of West Virginia the vacant lands and water-power at Harper's Ferry, in the county of Jefferson.

Resolved by the Legislature of West Virginia, That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives be requested to introduce a bill into their respective bodies, asking the United States to cede to the State of West Virginia the vacant lands, water-power, or any other property belonging to the United States in the town of Harper's Ferry or county of Jefferson, the proceeds from the sale of which shall be applied to educational purposes as directed by the Legislature of this State; that the governor shall cause a copy of the foregoing resolution, immediately upon its passage, to be transmitted to each Senator and Representative in Congress from this State.

Adopted by the Legislature of West Virginia January 24, 1881.

Attest:

J. B. PEYTON,
Clerk of the House of Delegates.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That the claimant in the matter of the claim of Reuben S. Jones, of Memphis, Tennessee, have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If there is no further morning business——

Mr. INGALLS. I ask action on the order I introduced on a previous day relative to the hour of meeting of the Senate on and after Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the following order, submitted by Mr. INGALLS on the 10th instant:

Ordered, That on and after Monday next the daily hour of meeting shall be eleven o'clock a. m.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate agree to this order?

The order was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 32, noes 9.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In connection with that order I desire to make an inquiry. When we meet at eleven o'clock will the morning hour cease at twelve o'clock, or will it continue to one? It is a question as to what was the intention of the mover.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes the proportionate time would be allotted to the morning hour.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That I think would be the proper understanding of the order.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not understand the question of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The order of the Senate is now that the morning hour begins at twelve o'clock and runs for the purpose of considering the Calendar until half past one. Now that the Senate is to meet at eleven, will an hour and a half still be retained as the morning hour, or will it extend to half past one?

Mr. INGALLS. The whole subject will be under the control of the Senate. My own judgment would be that the public interest would be promoted by the consideration of the cases on the Calendar until half past one; but the whole subject will of course rest with the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that that was the course last year. He was not present when it was adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I did not hear the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour ran under the Anthony rule until half past one. Shall that be the understanding of the Senate under the order just agreed to?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to agree to any such understanding as to the time when the morning hour ends with the vast amount of unfinished business there is of great public importance, appropriation bills, funding bill, and other bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The whole matter is in the power of a majority of the Senate.

DEBATE ON MOTIONS TO TAKE UP.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further business for the morning hour?

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to call up the resolution I submitted a few days ago limiting debate. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] then made objection to it; I do not know on what ground. I think the resolution ought to be adopted.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORGAN on the 10th instant:

Resolved, That on a motion to take up a bill or resolution for consideration at the present or at a future time debate shall be limited to fifteen minutes, and no Senator shall speak to such motion oftener than once or for a longer time than five minutes.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that a report?

Mr. MORGAN. It is not a report.

Mr. CONKLING. The resolution does not come from the Committee on Rules?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands not.

Mr. MORGAN. I offered the resolution in the Senate a few days since, and it was objected to, and went over under objection.

Mr. CONKLING. I was not aware that the resolution had been submitted. I should like to inquire, does it so change the rule that on a motion to take up, debate on any subject pertinent to the merits is in order?

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all. It does not affect the rule, as I understand. The resolution provides that on a motion to take up a bill or resolution for present or fixing a time for future consideration the debate shall be limited to fifteen minutes.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator remember any instance in which without violating the rule a Senator has been able to talk fifteen minutes on a motion to take up?

Mr. MORGAN. I think during the last week I have heard a debate extending over an hour upon a question whether the Senate would take up one bill or another.

Mr. CONKLING. I submit to the Senator (I have not noticed what he speaks of) that if the rule as it stands is enforced, namely, that no debate shall occur and no reference be made to the merits of a measure on a motion to take up, it would be impossible that fifteen minutes should be consumed upon such a motion as that.

Mr. MORGAN. Notwithstanding that rule, debate has not only run over fifteen minutes frequently: it has run over half an hour, and over an hour. My purpose is that debate shall be limited by the Chair to fifteen minutes on motions to take up bills for present consideration or to be considered at a future time, fixing a special order.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator is quite clear that this resolution, being of later date, will not supersede the rule which prohibits debate upon the merits?

Mr. MORGAN. By no means; it is entirely in harmony with that rule.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if this is intended to be a standing rule of the Senate, to act for all subsequent sessions until repealed?

Mr. MORGAN. It is not so framed. There is no phraseology making it a standing rule of the Senate. It will only apply during this session, unless the Senate should hereafter renew it.

Mr. INGALLS. Unless there is some limitation placed in the body of the resolution, until it be repealed at some subsequent session of the Senate, it would continue to be operative.

Mr. MORGAN. I think it would require an express order that it should be put among the standing rules to give it the effect the Senator from Kansas supposes. The resolution, if adopted now, would be a provision that might be repealed to-morrow; it could be set aside at any time.

Mr. INGALLS. I should be unwilling to agree to any resolution that would have the effect of making that a standing order of the Senate, although I think that during the remainder of this session it might be advisable perhaps to apply it in the manner designated by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I am entirely willing to put in words limiting the resolution to this session.

Mr. INGALLS. I think the words should be inserted.

Mr. MORGAN. "For the remainder of the session."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be thus modified, and the question is on agreeing to it as modified.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let it be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution as modified will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That for the remainder of the session, on a motion to take up a bill or resolution for consideration at the present or at a future time debate shall be limited to fifteen minutes, and no Senator shall speak to such motion oftener than once or for a longer time than five minutes.

Mr. CONKLING. The word "present" should be inserted before "session," so as to read "for the remainder of the present session."

Mr. MORGAN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That modification will be made.

Mr. INGALLS. The resolution practically limits debate to three Senators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

The resolution was agreed to; ayes 28, noes not counted.

SUITS AGAINST GOVERNMENT OFFICERS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I hope the Chair will recognize me as soon as morning business is over.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas rise to morning business?

Mr. GARLAND. No, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order has been demanded by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] which is the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the standing order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdraw the demand for the regular order so far as the measure which the Senator from Illinois wishes to have considered is concerned.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 2075) to amend section 989, Revised Statutes, so as to extend its provision to all officers of the United States in the performance of official acts in which the United States is a party or has an interest. The Judiciary Committee reported the bill unanimously, and the Treasury Department is very anxious to have it passed. I can explain it in a minute.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Commitee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That section 989 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 989. When a recovery is had in any suit or proceeding against a collector or other officer or employé of the United States for any act done by him in the performance of official duty in which the United States is a party or has an interest, or for the recovery of any money exacted by or paid to him, and by him paid into the Treasury, in the performance of his official duty, and the court certifies that there was probable cause for the act done by the collector or other officer or employé, or that he acted under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, or other proper officer of the Government, the court may stay proceedings under such judgment against such officer or employé for a period not exceeding twelve months; and the amount so recovered shall, upon final judgment, be provided for and paid out of the proper appropriation from the Treasury."

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator from Illinois to state the change the bill makes in the existing law.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Section 989 of the Revised Statutes provides that collectors and other officers of the revenue, where the United States is a party in interest, shall be protected in the performance of their official duty if the court certifies that there was probable cause for the act done by the collector or other officer; and that no execution shall issue against such collector or other officer, but upon final judgment the amount shall be paid out of the Treasury.

There are two amendments made to that section by the bill. One is to extend it to other officers and employés of the United States as well as revenue officers. A great many instances were called to the attention of the Judiciary Committee where officers of the mint at San Francisco, the postmaster at New York, and various other officers of the Government were sued. There is no reason why the law should be confined to revenue officers, but it should be extended to all officers who are acting under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury or other head of Department, when the court will certify that there is probable cause for the conduct of the officer. The statute at present says that no execution shall issue in such a case where a recovery is had, but after the final judgment the amount shall be paid out of the Treasury. The Judiciary Committee doubt very much whether there is authority in a civil suit to say that the execution shall not issue, but they have provided that it shall be suspended long enough for the Government to provide for the payment. That is a statement of the change made in the existing law by the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. There is no other change?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There is no other change.

Mr. McMILLAN. Do I understand the Senator to say that the amendment extends to the officers and employés of the Government?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. To officers and employés of the Government who act under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, or other head of Department.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 989, Revised Statutes, relating to suits against officers of the United States."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROLLINS. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. The regular order is called for.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to state the request which I desire to make to the Senate? I wish the Senate to take up and consider Senate bill No. 404, to amend section 14, chapter 1, title 2 of the Revised Statutes. The bill was taken up on a former occasion, and I think it will occupy but a few moments more. If any action whatever is to be had on the subject, it is necessary that it should be done at once. If the Senate will agree to allow the bill to be read—it is very brief, only a few lines—Senators will see at once the propriety of immediate action upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the call for the regular order withdrawn?

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the regular order. We are now at order of business No. 573; we can soon reach the bill referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. ROLLINS. Does the Senator from Missouri object to the reading of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order, and that bill, when reached in regular order, will be read.

Mr. ANTHONY. I gave notice day before yesterday that at the close of the morning business to-day I should ask the indulgence of the Senate to make some remarks upon the report of the two committees that visited Rhode Island to inquire into alleged violation of the law in that State. If it be the pleasure of the Senate, I will now proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island? The Chair hears none.

ELECTIONS AND APPOINTMENTS IN RHODE ISLAND.

Mr. ANTHONY. I enter a formal motion that the report of the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to which was referred the resolutions of the Senate of May 29 and of June 18, 1879, be recommitted to that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That motion is pending, and the Senator from Rhode Island has the floor.

DEFENSE OF RHODE ISLAND.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, there are persons within and without, mainly without the State, who are calling upon Congress to interpose its authority in guaranteeing a republican form of government in Rhode Island, on account of our constitutional limitations upon the suffrage. Those who clamor on this matter from without the State are clearly meddling with what is not their proper concern; those within have mainly come from other States and countries, attracted by the advantages of a residence in Rhode Island, and belong to a class which has been happily described as composed of men who came among us uninvited, and "on whose departure there is no restraint."

Those persons are just about ninety-one years too late in their demand. It should have been made when the State entered the Union; and then would have been referred to the representatives of the other States, most of which placed equal or greater restriction upon the suffrage, and some of which do still; for the constitution of Rhode Island is more liberal now, in respect to suffrage, than it was at that time, and was then a more liberal government, generally, than prevailed in most of the States which preceded her in ratifying the fundamental law.

DEFINITIONS OF REPUBLIC.

A republic is not necessarily a democracy. It may be as far removed from that as from a despotism. It is not essential to a republican form of government that the suffrage should be universal. If it were, none of the States had in the beginning, and none of them have now, a republican form of government.

Noah Webster defines a republic:

A State in which the sovereign power is exercised by representatives elected by the people.

Worcester defines it:

That form of government in which the supreme power is vested in the people, or in representatives, elected by the people; a commonwealth. A republic may be either a democracy or an aristocracy. In the former the supreme power is vested in the whole body of the people, or in representatives elected by the people; in the latter, it is vested in a nobility, or a privileged class, of comparatively a small number of persons.

Ogilvie defines a republic as—

A commonwealth; a political community in which several persons share the sovereign power, or that form of government in which the supreme power is vested in the people, or in representatives chosen by them. A republic may be either an aristocracy or a democracy; the supreme power in the former being consigned to the nobles, or a few privileged individuals, as was formerly the case in Venice and Genoa; while in the latter the supreme power is placed in the hands of rulers chosen by and from the whole body of the people, or by their representatives assembled in a congress or national assembly.

Montesquieu, in his L'Esprit des Lois, gives this definition:

A republican government is that in which the body, or only a part of the people, is possessed of the supreme power.

Macaulay says:

The Roman Emperors were republican magistrates, named by the senate.

Lord Brougham, in his Political Philosophy, says:

The name of a republic has also been applied to a monarchy, as in the case of Poland; nor, indeed, could the principalities into which the Italian republics declined, and the mixed government of the united provinces, though termed republics, be considered in any other light than as a species of monarchy.

George Cornewall Lewis, in his "Remarks on the use and abuse of some political terms," says:

Commonwealth, or republic, is a general name for all governments in which the sovereign power resides in several persons, whether they be few or many. Thus we speak of the commonwealths or republics of Rome in early times, Venice, &c., which were aristocracies; of Athens, of Rome in later times, &c., which were democracies.

Johnson, who was the accepted authority at the time when the Constitution was framed and ratified, defines a republic:

Commonwealth: State in which the power is lodged in more than one.

Madison, in the Federalist, defines a republic as—

A government in which the scheme of representation takes place.

This was the meaning of the word republican then, and is its meaning now. Rome, in a part of her history, Venice, Genoa, Florence, Pisa, were anciently republics, and are recognized as such in history. They had a republican form of government, with institutions highly aristocratic, and as far removed from real democracy as the monarchies around them. If it be said that the significance of the word "republican" has changed with new ideas, that have been introduced in government, since the formation of the Constitution, the reply is that the instrument is to be interpreted by the significance of the language at the time when it was employed. Otherwise it is saying too much, for since that time the word has twice been employed as the designation of a party; and, by that interpretation, the Constitution must be construed as guaranteeing a government of the republican party, which, I think, would hardly be accepted by those who adduce this argument.

SUFFRAGE IN THE SEVERAL STATES AT THE TIME OF ENTERING THE UNION.

The suffrage of Rhode Island, when she entered the Union, was limited to the holders of real estate of the value of $134, or of the annual rental of $7, and to the eldest sons of such land-holders. No additional qualification was required of the governor, general officers, and members of the General Assembly; neither was any man disqualified from holding any office on account of his religious belief, or because he was a minister of the Gospel. Now, let us see what were the qualifications for suffrage and eligibility to office in the twelve States that preceded Rhode Island in entering the Union.

New Hampshire required the payment of a poll-tax as a qualification for suffrage, and that the governor and members of the Legislature should profess the Protestant religion; that the senators should have a property qualification of £200 and the representatives of £100.

Massachusetts required as a qualification for suffrage a freehold estate of £60 or the annual value of £3; that a senator should own real estate to the value of £600 at least, or personal estate worth £600 at least, and have been an inhabitant of the Commonwealth for five years preceding his election; that a representative should own real estate to the value of £100, or personal property worth £200; and that the governor should own real estate to the value of £1,000 and have been an inhabitant of the State for seven years preceding his election; and further required of any person elected governor, lieutenant-governor, councilor, senator, or representative, the declaration of a belief in the Christian religion and a firm persuasion of its truth, as preliminary to entering upon the duties of his office.

Connecticut required a freehold of the annual value of $7, or the performance of duty in the enrolled militia, or the payment of a State tax.

New York required a freehold of £20 or of the annual rental of forty shillings; and all ministers of the Gospel were declaredineligible for holding any civil or military office.

New Jersey required a clear estate of the value of £50, proclamation money, and a year's residence; it was also required that legislative councilors should be worth at least £1,000, proclamation money, of real or personal estate, and members of the Legislative Assembly £500.

Pennsylvania required, and still requires, that the elector should be a tax-payer; and also, by implication, authorized the disqualification of infidels and atheists. It was necessary that a member of the house of representatives should have resided in the city or county for which he was chosen for two years preceding his election.

Delaware required the members of the upper branch of the Legislature to be twenty-seven years of age and possessed of a freehold of two hundred acres of land or £1,000 in other property.

Maryland required, as a qualification for suffrage, a freehold of fifty acres of land, or an estate of £30 current money. For members of the Legislature she required a property qualification of £500; and the bill of rights authorized the requirement of a declaration of belief in the Christian religion, as a qualification for any office of trust or profit, while ministers of the Gospel were excluded from the general assembly and the council.

Virginia limited the suffrage to freeholders and tax-payers, and I believe that as late as our day electors were allowed to vote for members of one branch of the Legislature, in every district in which they owned real estate.

North Carolina required a qualification of three hundred acres of land for a senator and one hundred for a representative; the qualification for a voter for senator was fifty acres of land, of a voter for representative that he be a tax-payer. Clergymen were excluded from membership in the senate, the house of commons, and the council of state; and any person was disqualified from holding any civil office who should deny the being of God or the truth of the Protestant religion, or the divine authority of the Bible, or who should hold religious principles incompatible with the freedom and safety of the State.

South Carolina required, as a qualification for suffrage, a freehold of fifty acres of land or a town lot, or the payment of a tax of three shillings sterling the preceding year. For member of the house of representatives a freehold of five hundred acres of land and the ownership of ten negroes was required—a pretty qualification this for a republican form of government according to the ideas of those who dispute the republican form of Rhode Island—or a freehold estate of the value of £150; for senator, a freehold of £300 value, clear of debt. In case of non-residents in the election district a larger qualification was required. For governor, an estate of the value of £1,500 was required, a great sum in those days, fully equal in its purchasing power to $15,000 in our time.

The constitution under which South Carolina ratified the Constitution of the United States and came into the Union required, as a qualification for suffrage, a belief in God and in future rewards and punishments; and a freehold of fifty acres of land. For senator was required the qualification of a freehold of £2,000, if resident in the district, and of £7,000 if a non-resident. For representative was required a qualification of £1,000 of residents, and £3,500 of non-residents, in the respective districts, a belief in the Protestant religion, and three years' residence in the State. For governor, lieutenant-governor, and privy councilor a freehold qualification of £10,000 was required, an enormous sum at that time, and which must have restricted the persons from whom those officers could be selected to a very small part of the people. Moreover, they were required to profess the Protestant religion, which was declared to be the established religion of the State, and there were enumerated in the constitution five cardinal articles of faith which must be professed, in order to entitle a church to corporate privileges.

Georgia affixed to the right of suffrage the qualification of being a tax-payer, or of having a mechanical trade.

This was a republican form of government, according to the ideas of those who object to our Rhode Island limitations upon the suffrage.

These were the States that agreed, in the fundamental law, to guarantee to each other a republican form of government. What were their ideas of a republican form of government in respect to suffrage is shown by their own constitutions. The Federalist, (No. 42,) written by Mr. Madison, is very explicit and quite conclusive on the nature and extent of the constitutional guarantee. It says:

It may possibly be asked what need there could be of such a precaution, and whether it may not become a pretext for alterations in the State governments, without the concurrence of the States themselves. These questions admit of ready answers. If the interposition of the General Government should not be needed, the provision for such an event will be a harmless superfluity only in the Constitution. But who can say what experiments may be produced by the caprice of particular States, by the ambition of enterprising leaders, or by the intrigues and influence of foreign powers? To the second question it may be answered, that if the General Government should interpose by virtue of this constitutional authority, it will be of course bound to pursue the authority. But the authority extends no farther than to a guarantee of a republican form of government, which supposes a pre-existing government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States, they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the States may choose to substitute other republican forms, they have a right to do so, and to claim the Federal guarantee for the latter. The only restriction imposed on them is that they shall not exchange republican for anti-republican constitutions, a restriction which, it is presumed, will hardly be considered as a grievance.

* * * * * * *

Is it true that force and right are necessarily on the same side in republican governments? May not the minor party possess such a superiority of pecuniary resources, of military talents and experience, or of secret succors from foreign powers as will render it superior also in an appeal to the sword? May not a more compact and advantageous position turn the scale on the same side, against a superior number so situated as to be less capable of a prompt and collected exertion of its strength? Nothing can be more chimerical than to imagine that in a trial of actual force victory may be calculated by the rules which prevail in a census of the inhabitants or which determine the event of an election. May it not happen, in fine, that the minority of CITIZENS may become a majority of PERSONS, by the accession of alien residents, of a casual concourse of adventurers, or of those whom the constitution of the State has not admitted to the rights of suffrage? I take no notice of an unhappy species of population abounding in some of the States, who, during the calm of regular government, are sunk below the level of men, but who, in the tempestuous scenes of civil violence, may emerge into the human character and give a superiority of strength to any party with which they may associate themselves.

OFFICIAL RECOGNITION OF THE REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT IN RHODE ISLAND.

The republican form of government in Rhode Island was recognized by the President of the United States, in 1842, when an insurrection against its authority was organized, on the very ground of an extension of suffrage, and with specious pretenses that it had the support of a majority of the people. The insurgents attempted to take possession of the government, which they claimed by virtue of a pretended vote of the people, and armed themselves for that purpose. The constituted authorities of the State appealed to the President, in the mode pointed out by the Constitution of the United States, under the guarantee of a republican form of government, by protection against invasion and domestic violence. On this very ground, under the obligation of this very provision of the Constitution, President Tyler addressed a letter, dated May 5, 1842, to the governor of Rhode Island, from which the following is an extract:

I shall not adventure the expression of an opinion upon those questions of domestic policy which seem to have given rise to the unfortunate controversies between a portion of the citizens and the existing government of the State. They are questions of municipal regulation, the adjustment of which belongs exclusively to the people of Rhode Island, and with which this Government can have nothing to do. For the regulation of my conduct, in any interposition which I may be called upon to make between the government of a State and any portion of its citizens who may assail it with domestic violence, or may be in actual insurrection against it, I can only look to the Constitution and laws of the United States, which plainly declare the obligations of the Executive Department, AND LEAVE IT NO ALTERNATIVE AS TO THE COURSE IT SHALL PURSUE.

By the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, it is provided that the United States SHALL GUARANTEE TO EVERY STATE IN THIS UNION A REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on the application of the Legislature, or executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence. And by the act of Congress, approved on the 28th February, 1795, it is declared that in case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, upon application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection. By the third section of the same act, it is provided that whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the President, to use the military force hereby directed to be called forth, the President shall forthwith, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within a reasonable time.

By the act of March 3, 1807, it is provided "that in all cases of insurrection or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States, or any individual State or Territory where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ for the same purposes such part of the land or naval force of the United States as shall be judged necessary, having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect."

This is the first occasion, so far as the government of a State and its people are concerned, on which it has become necessary to consider of the propriety of exercising these high and most important constitutional and legal functions. By a careful consideration of the above-recited acts of Congress, your excellency will not fail to see that no power is vested in the Executive of the United States to anticipate insurrectionary movements against the government of Rhode Island so as to sanction the interposition of the military authority, but that there must be an actual insurrection manifested by lawless assemblages of the people or otherwise, to whom a proclamation may be addressed, and who may be required to betake themselves to their respective abodes. I have, however, to assure your excellency, that should the time arrive (and my fervent prayer is that it may never come) when an insurrection shall exist against the government of Rhode Island, and a requisition shall be made upon the Executive of the United States to furnish that protection which is guaranteed to each State by the Constitution and laws, I SHALL NOT BE FOUND TO SHRINK FROM THE PERFORMANCE OF A DUTY WHICH, WHILE IT WOULD BE THE MOST PAINFUL, IS, AT THE SAME TIME, THE MOST IMPERATIVE. I have also to say that in such a contingency the Executive could not look into real or supposed defects of the existing government in order to ascertain whether some other plan of government proposed for adoption was better suited to the wants and more in accordance with the wishes of any portion of her citizens. To throw the executive power of this Government into any such controversy would be to make the President the armed arbitrator between the people of the different States and their constituted authorities, and might lead to an usurped power, dangerous alike to the stability of the State governments and the liberties of the people.

It will be my duty, on the contrary, to respect the requisitions of that government which has been recognized as the existing government of the State through all time past, until I shall be advised in regular manner that it has been altered and abolished, and another substituted in its place by legal and peaceable proceedings, adopted and pursued by the authorities and people of the State.

And, in a subsequent letter, dated May 7, 1842, he said:

I freely confess that I should experience great reluctance in employing the military power of this Government against any portion of the people; but, however painful the duty, I have to assure your excellency that if resistance is made to the execution of the laws of Rhode Island by such force as the civil posse shall be unable to overcome, it will be the duty of this Government to enforce the constitutional guarantee, a guarantee given and adopted mutually by all the original States, of which Rhode Island was one, and which in the same way has been given and adopted by each of the States since admitted into the Union. And if any exigency of lawless violence shall actually arise, the Executive Government of the United States, on the application of your excellency, under the authority of the resolutions of the Legislature already transmitted, will stand ready to succor the authorities of the State in their efforts to maintain a due respect for the laws.

At the date of these letters Daniel Webster was the Secretary of State, and his authority is added to that of Madison.

The States generally have enlarged their suffrage, but they have done this voluntarily and in their own discretion, without compulsion, or advice, or suggestion by the Federal Government, except in the fifteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution. No pressure has been applied by the Federal Government, nor has it ever been pretended that the Federal Government had the right to interpose its authority, other than in the case provided by the fifteenth amendment, by which our suffrage was not affected.

If Rhode Island was not republican when she entered the Union, the other States were not; and if she was republican then, she is now, for the changes in her suffrage have been in the direction of liberality. Many of the Northern States adhered to their discrimination against colored citizens, till the results of the war compelled its abandonment, and all the Southern States retained or established it. In New York the proposition to admit colored citizens to equal rights of suffrage was submitted to a separate vote, with the constitution of 1846, and was rejected. It was submitted again, in an amendment in 1860, and again in 1868, and was both times rejected. It was not adopted till 1874, when the fifteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution had removed the disqualification and established the equality of the whites and the blacks in the suffrage. New Hampshire resisted, through all parties, the repeal of the religious test, in discrimination against the Roman Catholics, till 1877.

The right of a State to fix her own suffrage is as well settled as anything in our form of government. It existed at the formation of the Government, and it has not been impaired since, except by the fifteenth amendment, to which our suffrage was already in conformity. That the fourteenth amendment does not affect our suffrage was determined by the unanimous report of the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate, of which committee, and concurring in the report, was my distinguished friend, the senior Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and by the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Minor vs. Happersett.

Many of the States still require the payment of assessed taxes as a qualification for voting. Rhode Island requires, for native citizens, only a voluntary tax of $1, to be applied to the support of public education; and even this is waived in the case of performance of militia duty; and, assuredly, an assessed tax in any State must be on property of the value of $134, which makes our suffrage for citizens of foreign birth as liberal as the general suffrage in those States, except in the character of the property assessed. Nor is Rhode Island the only State that discriminates between the native and the foreign-born citizens. New York requires that a naturalized citizen shall have been naturalized ten days before voting. Pennsylvania requires thirty days. Michigan requires of citizens of foreign birth a residence of two years and six months after declaration of their intention of naturalization, while for native citizens a residence of only three months is required. Massachusetts required from 1859, when the provision was adopted as an amendment to her constitution, till 1863, when it was repealed, two years. So that a naturalized landholder, while that provision was in force, could not vote as soon, by two years, as he could and can, in Rhode Island. If the right to discriminate at all be conceded, the States themselves must be the judges of the limits of the discrimination; and it is not less truly a violation of republican form of government in New York to require ten days, and in Pennsylvania to require thirty days, in Michigan to require two years and three months, and in Massachusetts to have required two years additional residence of citizens of foreign birth, than it is in Rhode Island to require the possession of one hundred and thirty-four dollars' worth of real estate.

SUFFRAGE IN RHODE ISLAND NOT AFFECTED BY THE FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS.

But the case is too plain for argument or illustration. It is settled by the facts, it is confirmed in the exposition of the Constitution by James Madison, in the Federalist, and by Daniel Webster, in the case of the Rhode Island insurrection; by the unanimous report of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate; by the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The committee, referring to the effect of the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, say:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Rhode Island setting forth, by reference, the fourteenth and fifteenth articles of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and stating that "the State of Rhode Island, notwithstanding the provisions of the above-named amendments, persists in and by the first section of article 2 of the constitution of said State, in denying and abridging the right of about ten thousand citizens of the United States to vote at any and all elections holden in said State," and praying that Congress will "pass such appropriate legislation as may be found necessary to obtain for, and secure to, the citizens of the United States resident in Rhode Island all the rights, privileges, and immunities guaranteed to them by the Constitution of the United States," respectfully report:

That the constitution of Rhode Island, adopted in 1842, prescribes two alternative classes of qualifications for voting. The first gives to all male citizens of the United States of a certain age, &c., the right to vote, if they own real estate of the value of $134 or which shall rent for $7 per annum. The second gives to every male native citizen of the United States of a certain age, &c., the right to vote, if he pays a tax of one dollar a year, &c., although he may not own real estate. No man or party has ever questioned the right of the people of Rhode Island, and of every other State, to establish such a constitution of government as may be agreeable to their views of the public welfare in that State, although its provisions as to suffrage may not conform to the opinions of citizens of other States. At the time when this constitution of Rhode Island was adopted the right to regulate the qualifications of voters belonged exclusively to the respective States. The petition under consideration fully recognizes this, but it raises the question (although studiously framed in such a manner as not to declare or insist upon such a conclusion) whether, by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States, natives of foreign countries who may have become citizens of the United States are not entitled to vote in Rhode Island, without regard to the qualifications imposed by her constitution?

The committee is unanimously of the opinion that this question must be answered in the negative.

The "privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States," mentioned in the petition as secured by the fourteenth amendment, do not include the right of suffrage. If they did, the right must necessarily exist in all citizens of the United States, from the mere fact of citizenship, without the power in any State or in Congress to abridge the same in any degree; and in such case, therefore, no qualification of any kind could be imposed, and all persons, (being citizens,) males and females, infants, lunatics, and criminals, without respect to age, length of residence, or any other thing, would be entitled to participate directly in all elections. Every provision in every State, which experience has proved to be essential to security and good order in society, would thereby be overthrown. It is enough to say that the rights secured by this amendment to the Constitution are of an altogether different character.

The fifteenth amendment does apply to rights of suffrage, and to those only. By it the State of Rhode Island, in common with every other State, is forbidden to deny or abridge the right of citizens of the United States "to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." But, plainly, the constitution of Rhode Island does not preclude any citizen from voting on either or any of the grounds thus prohibited. No fact of race, or color, or previous servitude prevents any citizen from voting in Rhode Island. Neither of these qualities depends in any degree upon the place of his nativity. This seems too obvious to need discussion. It is also a fact, appearing in the public records of Congress and doubtless known to the petitioners, that when the fifteenth amendment was under consideration by Congress it was proposed to embrace in it a prohibition of any denial of suffrage on account of "nativity," and that this proposition was not agreed to, for the reason that Congress did not think it expedient to restrict the ancient powers of the States in those respects any further than appeared to be absolutely needful to secure to the whole people the great results of the overthrow of the rebellion.

The committee is therefore of opinion that there is nothing in the provisions of the constitution of Rhode Island referred to in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Whether these provisions are wise or right in themselves is a matter over which neither the committee nor Congress has any control. That subject belongs to the people of Rhode Island, who, it must be presumed, will correct any and all errors that may, from time to time, be found to exist in her internal affairs.

And again, in the unanimous report of the same committee in its report on the memorial claiming the right of female suffrage, the committee says:

By the Constitution of the United States, prior to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, the power to regulate suffrage, even in the election of President and Vice-President, Senators and Repepresentatives in Congress, was possessed by the States composing the Union, so that Congress could make no affirmative provision concerning the same; nor could Congress alter or amend regulations made upon this subject by the respective States. Article I, section 2, provides as follows:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

Section 3 of the same article provides:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote."

Article III, section 1, provides:

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress."

From these provisions of the Constitution it is apparent that the States possessed the sole power of determining the qualifications of electors therein. And, so far as these provisions are concerned, it is manifest that each State had the power to make such discrimination as it pleased between its own citizens in regard to their participation in the elective franchise. Each State might admit all citizens, male and female, over a prescribed age, or only some classes of them, or might require a property qualification, which would, in effect, exclude all citizens not possessing the required amount of property. Each State might discriminate in this particular between its citizens on account of race, color, servitude, or upon any other ground. And under this Constitution the several States established various and incongruous regulations upon this subject. In Massachusetts no distinction on account of color was recognized, while in other States all persons having even admixture of African blood, however slight, were excluded; and some States required a property qualification, while others did not.

There is, however, another provision of the Constitution which merits consideration in this connection. Article IV, section 4, provides:

"The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

Under this provision it is insisted, with some plausibility, that a State government which denies the elective franchise to a majority of the citizens of such State is not "a republican form of government." But your committee are not satisfied that this proposition can be maintained. In construing the Constitution we are compelled to give it such interpretation as will secure the result which was intended to be accomplished by those who framed it and the people who adopted it. The Constitution, like a contract between private parties, must be read in the light of the circumstances which surrounded those who made it. The history of the colonies, the history of the Confederation, and the circumstances under which the Constitution itself was framed and adopted, must all be taken into account; and then we must ascertain by reading the whole instrument together the sense in which particular provisions and phrases were employed. If any State government which to-day excludes from suffrage a majority of its citizens is not in form a republican government, then a State government which did the same thing at the time the Constitution was adopted was not in form a republican government. The exclusion of all female citizens from the suffrage cannot impair the republican form of an existing State government, unless the same thing worked the same result upon the State governments in existence when the Constitution of the United States was adopted.

It was assumed on all hands that the governments of the thirteen States which framed and adopted the Constitution were in form republican; and this provision was intended to keep them so, and make it impossible for any State to change its government into a monarchy. The construction of this provision now contended for would have made it the duty of the Government of the Union, during the first year of its existence, to enter upon the reconstruction or remodeling the governments of the States by which the Union itself had been spoken into existence. In view of the history of those times, it cannot be maintained that the States or the people intended to confer such a power upon the Government of the Union; and no one can doubt that such an attempt on the part of the Union, in regard to the thirteen States, would have been condemned by the unanimous voice and resisted by the united force of the people. If such a power did not then exist under the Constitution of the United States, it does not now exist under this provision of the Constitution which has not been amended. A construction which should give the phrase "a republican form of government" a meaning differing from the sense in which it was understood and employed by the people when they adopted the Constitution, would be as unconstitutional as a departure from the plain and express language of the Constitution in any other particular. This is the rule of interpretation adopted by all commentators on the Constitution, and in all judicial expositions of that instrument; and your committee are satisfied of the entire soundness of this principle. A change in the popular use of any word employed in the Constitution cannot retroact upon the Constitution, either to enlarge or limit its provisions.

There is another provision of the Constitution which is generally referred to in this connection, but which, in the opinion of your committee, has no application to the subject. Article 4, section 2, provides:

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

It has been much discussed whether the right to vote and hold office in a State was within the privileges and immunities protected by the provision above quoted. But it is unnecessary to consider that question here, because, even if the right to vote and hold office be considered as embraced within this provision, still it was in the power of the State to which a citizen might remove to determine what class of citizens should or should not vote or hold office in such State; and the citizen removing to such State was only entitled to the privileges and immunities possessed by the class of citizens to which such removing citizen belonged under the constitution and laws of the State to which he had removed.

We come now to consider the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution, under which, also, the right of female suffrage is claimed. The fourteenth amendment, so far as applicable to this subject, is as follows:

"All persons born and naturalized in the United States, &c., are citizens of the United States, and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

The second section of this amendment provides that—

"Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election, &c., is denied to any of the male inhabitants being twenty-one years of age, &c., the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

It is evident from the second section of this amendment above quoted that the States are considered to possess the power of excluding a portion of their male citizens from the right to vote upon grounds or reasons to be determined by themselves; because this section determines that, in case the State shall exercise this right so as to exclude citizens of the United States, except for commission of crime, the basis of representation for such State shall be correspondingly reduced.

And the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Minors. Happersett, has settled the same question.

Upon this question the Chief-Justice leaves no room to doubt as to what is the opinion of the court. He says that at the adoption of the constitution every State, except Rhode Island,* had a constitution of its own, in no one of which were all its citizens permitted to vote. Each State determined for itself who should vote, and in this state of the laws there can be no doubt if it had been intended by the framers of the Constitution to make all citizens voters that the instrument would have said so, and not left it for implication. That such was not the intention is to be found in the provision that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States, and if suffrage is a part of citizenship, then the citizens of each State, while retaining their original citizenship, may vote in any State—a claim not yet set up.

Another reason for believing that it was never intended that suffrage and citizenship should be coextensive is found in the fourteenth amendment itself; where, after providing that Representatives in Congress shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, (excluding Indians not taxed,) the amendment declares that "when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State." The Chief-Justice adds:

Why this, if it was not in the power of the Legislature to deny the right of suffrage to some male inhabitants? And if suffrage was necessarily one of the absolute rights of citizenship, why confine the operation of the limitation to male inhabitants? Women and children are, as we have seen, "persons." They are counted in the enumeration upon which the apportionment is to be made; but if they were necessarily voters because of their citizenship, unless clearly excluded, why inflict the penalty for the exclusion of males alone? Clearly, no such form of words would have been selected to express the idea here indicated if suffrage was the absolute right of all citizens. And, still again, after the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, it was deemed necessary to adopt a fifteenth, as follows: "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The fourteenth amendment has already provided that no State should make or enforce any law which should abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. If suffrage was one of these privileges or immunities, why amend the Constitution to prevent its being denied on account of race, &c.? Nothing is more evident than that the greater must include the less, and if all were already protected, why go through with the form of amending the Constitution to protect a part?

Previously to this, Judge Deady, of the United States district court in Oregon, had arrived at the same decision. He says:

Under the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution, and the act of May 1, 1870, to enforce it, all persons declared citizens of the United States by the fifteenth amendment are entitled to vote in the States where they reside, at all elections by the people, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; but the several States, notwithstanding the amendment, have the power to deny the right of suffrage to any citizen of the United States on account of age, sex, PLACE OF BIRTH, vocation, WANT OF PROPERTY or intelligence, neglect of civic duties, crime, or other cause not specified in the amendment.

The senior Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE,] in a speech at the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress, arguing that the whole matter of the suffrage, except the provisions of the fifteenth amendment, is exclusively of State concern, said:

It is thus settled upon principle and by authority, as well as from the history of our institutions, that the voters under our systems are the people qualified by State laws and constitutions, and that the Federal Government has no voters of its own creation. Suffrage is under State control except in the single case of race, upon which subject the States can make no rule of discrimination. If there be such a thing, then, as a "national election," it wants the first element of an election—a national voter. The Federal Government, or (if it suits our friends on the other side better) the nation, has no voters; it cannot create them, it cannot qualify them. The depositary of absolute sovereignty and power is in the people, the people of the States, qualified as electors by State constitutions and State laws; and all authority of every kind comes from them by representation, and this vital principle of democracy permeates every part of the Government.

National power over the voter as such, or national elections as such, are new forms of old federal theories. In the laws we propose to repeal, and in kindred enactments in 1870 and 1871, the revamped doctrines of the federalism of 1798 first finds statutory existence. The universal practice of the Government since 1801 has been against any such theory as is found in these statutes. National electors would require national citizenship for qualification. How absurd a theory, that a man may be a citizen of the State and not of the United States and yet be a national voter. Yet I propose to show that such would be the legitimate result of this teaching as to national elections. This subject is rightly and absolutely controlled by State law and State constitutions in almost every State. There are no national voters. Voters who vote for national Representatives are qualified by State constitutions and State laws, and national citizenship is not required of a voter of the State by any provision of the Federal Constitution nor in practice. Under the constitutions of Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado an unnaturalized foreigner who has declared his intention to become a citizen may vote for members of Congress and State officers if he has resided six months in the State, and in Indiana, Minnesota, Oregon, and Wisconsin after a residence of twelve months, while in Massachusetts* he must have resided in the State two years after he has been naturalized. Does the new gospel as to control of elections by national authority contemplate making the rule of seven years' residence, required by Massachusetts, or that of six months, required by Kansas, the test of qualification as a "national" voter for a foreign-born citizen? Which is the doctrine? Is it that of Massachusetts or that of Kansas? The foreign-born citizen declaring his intention, after six months' residence in Kansas, is a voter, and may vote for a member of Congress and governor of the State, while in Massachusetts he must carry a parchment certifying that he is a citizen of the United States and must have resided two years in Massachusetts. The whole difference is the difference between seven years in one State and six months in another as applied to foreign-born citizens.

A naturalized foreigner can vote in California after a residence of six months; Connecticut, after a residence of one year and able to read any article of the constitution or any section of the statutes of the State; Delaware, after one year's residence and having paid taxes; Illinois, after one year's residence; Iowa, six months' residence; Kentucky, two years' residence; Louisiana, one year's residence; Maine, three months; Maryland, one year; Michigan, three months; Mississippi, six months' residence; Nevada, six months; New Hampshire and New Jersey, one year; North Carolina, one year; Ohio, one year; South Carolina, one year; Tennessee, one year; Vermont and Virginia, one year; and West Virginia, one year in the State. The same residence is required in those twenty-one States of the native-born citizens.

In these States residence is superadded by State authority as a qualification to voting for all officers, State as well as Federal. In Massachusetts two years, in Pennsylvania thirty days, and in New York ten days are added by State authority to the qualification of five years; and in Rhode Island ownership of real estate must be in the naturalized foreigner before he is a voter.

Are all these distinctions, are all the restrictions imposed by State authority and State constitutions as to residence, naturalization, qualification, registration, age, tax, and property to be obliterated in this effort for the "universality of the security of equal suffrage" in this renewed and earnest effort for a consolidated government?

It has been argued that the right to restrict the suffrage by a landed qualification might allow the practical denial of the right by exaggerating the value of the qualification, and it is asked, triumphantly, why may not the same power that limits the qualification to $134 extend it to $10,000, which would be less in purchasing power than the ancient qualification for governor, lieutenant-governor, or privy councilor of South Carolina? This could only be done by the people, who would not be likely thus to disfranchise themselves, however they might have the sovereign right to do so. But the argument drawn from the liability of abusing the restriction is an argument against any qualification for voting. What is to prevent the people from forming a constitution that shall limit the suffrage to men of seventy years of age? Therefore should there be no limitation of age? What is to prevent them from limiting it to men who have resided fifty years in the State? Therefore should there be no qualification of residence? What is to prevent the Legislature from assessing a tax of 50 per cent. upon property? Therefore should it not have the power of taxation? What is to prevent the Legislature from making Sabbath-breaking and profane swearing capital crimes? Therefore should it not have the power to define crimes, and to affix the punishment of them? No power can be wholly protected from abuse, but power must be granted for the purposes of government, and the supervision of the people over their servants, to whom they delegate it, must be relied upon to restrain it within reasonable limits, and to prevent any exercise of that power for extravagant purposes.

MODE OF AMENDMENT.

During the investigation of the committee appointed by the Senate to inquire into alleged frauds in the late elections, and which, in Rhode Island, took the form of an inquiry into the provisions of our State constitution, in matters pertaining exclusively to the State; in other words, into the right of the people of Rhode Island to manage their own affairs in their own way, much stress was laid by witnesses summoned to give eager testimony against the State in which they lived, and the laws whose protection they enjoyed; laws which were enacted by the people and to which the people have adhered, with patriotic persistency, upon the conservative mode of amending our constitution, and which was held up as anti-republican. The mode prescribed is the passage of a resolution proposing amendments by a majority of all the members elected to each house of two successive Legislatures, and the ratification by a vote of three-fifths of the people voting upon it.

Without going into a defense of the reasonableness of this mode of amendment, which assumes that something more than a mere majority, which may be accidental, may be fairly required in so grave a matter as a change of the fundamental law; without dwelling upon the evident argument that those who abstain from voting may be fairly counted as content with the existing constitution, and not favorable to a change, it is quite enough to compare our mode of amendment with the modes of other States, the republican form of whose government is not disputed, and with the mode prescribed in the Federal Constitution itself, that guarantees a republican form of government to all the States.

In the initiation of amendment Rhode Island is more liberal than most of the States. She requires only a majority of the members elected to two successive Legislatures to propose amendments for the consideration of the people. Alabama, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Kansas, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Nevada, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and West Virginia require the assent of two-thirds of their Legislatures, some of them the assent of two-thirds of two successive Legislatures, to the adoption of a proposition for submitting amendments to the people. Maryland requires the assent of three-fifths of all the members elected to each house of the Legislature. Nevada requires two-thirds of all the members elected to each house to call a convention for the revision of the constitution, and the approval of a majority of the people, not merely of those voting upon it, but a majority equal to the majority given for any candidate, or upon any question voted upon at the election. Massachusetts, in the original instrument which was in force at the adoption of the Federal Constitution when the guarantee of the republican form of government was made, required the assent of two-thirds of the people, given in town meeting, to a revisal of the constitution. She now requires the assent of a majority of the senate and two-thirds of the house to propose amendments for the ratification of the people. Delaware requires two-thirds of each house of the Legislature and the approval of the governor and three-quarters of each house of the next Legislature to amend the constitution, and does not require the submission of the amendment to the people. Vermont requires two-thirds of each house and a majority of each house in the next Legislature to propose amendments, and limits the right of proposing to once in ten years. New Hampshire requires the sense of the people to be taken once in seven years on the question of amending or revising the constitution, and that a vote of two-thirds of the people shall be necessary to the ratification of amendments.

The constitution of Indiana requires propositions of amendment to pass two successive Legislatures by a majority of the members elected to each house, then to be submitted "to the electors of the State, and if a majority of said electors shall ratify the same, such amendment or amendments shall become a part of this constitution." Yet, by a judicial decision, certain amendments that were submitted to the electors, under this provision, and ratified by an immense majority of the popular vote, were declared invalid, on the ground that they had failed to receive a majority of the whole number of votes given for any candidate, or on any question voted upon, at the same election. This decision practically makes the constitution of Indiana perpetual, for such is the character of our people that a proposition to change the fundamental law hardly ever brings out as large a vote as an election of officers, and if more than one amendment be submitted at the same time, only that on which the largest vote was given on both sides would be likely to receive a majority of all the votes cast. This decision appears to me, and I think to everybody else outside of those for whose partisan benefit it was made, as atrociously absurd. Yet it concerns the people of Indiana alone, and any criticism upon it here would be impertinent. It is none of my business, no more than the questions of the internal government of Rhode Island were the business of the committee which, under the chairmanship of the Senator from Pennsylvnia, assumed to inquire into, in the summer of 1879.

Without conceding the right of Congress to take cognizance of the matter, I submit that the provisions of constitutional amendment are more liberal in Rhode Island than in a majority of the States, and far more liberal than in some of them. The requirement of two-thirds of the Legislature to submit propositions of amendment is a greater impediment to change than the requirement of three-fifths of the popular vote to their ratification; and, when we consider the unequal representation of many of the States, in their Legislatures, gives a far greater negative power to the minority. But look at the mode of amendment provided in the Federal Constitution. Two-thirds of each House of Congress and the assent of three-fourths of the States are necessary to the ratification of amendments to that instrument, or the application of two-thirds of the States to call a convention for proposing amendments and the like assent of three-fourths of the States. One more than a quarter, in number, of the smaller States can prevent any amendment. One more than a third can prevent even the proposition of amendment.

The population of the thirty-seven States, by the census of 1870, was 38,015,641. An amendment to the Constitution might be proposed by the unanimous vote of both Houses of Congress and receive the ratification of twenty-seven States, including a population of 35,877,062, and be defeated by the votes of the following States, whose aggregate population is 2,238,579:

| Nevada | 42,491 |
| Oregon | 90,923 |
| Nebraska | 122,993 |
| Delaware | 125,015 |
| Florida | 187,748 |
| Rhode Island | 217,353 |
| Vermont | 330,551 |
| New Hampshire | 318,300 |
| Kansas | 364,399 |

If this be republican, in the judgment of the objectors to republican form of government in Rhode Island, I do not see how they can call even the Federal Constitution republican.

The administration of the power of amendment in Rhode Island has been most liberal. No less than eight times has the General Assembly, by large votes in both houses, often approaching to unanimity, submitted propositions of amendment. Those proposing the enlargement of the suffrage have been uniformly voted down, both political parties swelling the majorities against them. An effort was made to show before the committee that these propositions have sometimes been submitted in bad faith, that whig and republican members of the General Assembly voted for the submission to appease popular clamor, and then opposed them at the polls. The effort to prove this utterly failed. The testimony of the members of the General Assemby who voted to submit the amendments shows that they supported them at the election. But even if it was so, it would be only a proof of the liberality of the Government. A man may consistently vote to submit to the judgment of the people propositions that he does not approve. He votes to consult the popular will, content to abide by its verdict, and to live under such institutions as a constitutional majority of his fellow-citizens may choose. It does not follow that his own judgment approves of the decision of the majority, but only that he will not set it up against such decision. He votes to ask the people, whose elected servant he is, if they desire a change. As one of the people, he votes against it, and so far from being discreditable, this is an evidence of his respect for the will of the people. Had this point been sustained—as it clearly was not—it would have been an evidence of the elasticity and liberality of our constitution. And whether the amendment was put out in good faith or not, if the people had desired it, they could have adopted it.

THE RESTRICTION ON THE SUFFRAGE IN RHODE ISLAND NOT A PARTY MEASURE.

I have said that the propositions for enlarging the suffrage were voted down by both parties. They found supporters in both parties; but at no time anything like the entire strength of either. Had they received from the democratic party anything like the support that it gave to its candidates they would have prevailed. The first proposition to revise the constitution by a convention was voted down by nearly a two-thirds vote, although the State was then democratic; the next attempt—the State still democratic—was voted down by more than two to one. The last two attempts were made in 1871, at a special election, and in 1876, at a presidential election. It is to be observed that equal complaint has been made of the submission of the amendments, at a special and at a general election; that at the first there was nothing to call out the popular vote, and that at the second the popular mind was so much occupied with the immediate question of the day, that it had not the leisure to dwell upon the grave question of changes in the fundamental law. In 1871 the proposition for a general enlargement of the suffrage was voted down by more than two to one; and received but little more than half the votes that were given to the democratic candidates at the preceding election in April. At that election Gloucester, the democratic Gibraltar of the State—more than the Gibraltar, for it has never been captured—gave 40 votes for the amendment, and the following year it gave 171 for the democratic candidate for President; Cranston gave 70 for the amendment, 158 for the democratic ticket; New Shoreham, none for the amendment, not a vote, 24 for the democratic ticket; Exeter, not one for the amendment, 27 for the democratic ticket; Hopkinton, 6 for the amendment, 92 for the democratic ticket; Warwick, 49 for the amendment, 208 for the democratic ticket. This is the way in which the democratic party in Rhode Island vote for opening the suffrage, unrestricted, to all the citizens of the State. In 1876 the proposition was only to admit to the right of suffrage, without the landed qualification, citizens of foreign birth who had served in the war. The republican constituencies of Providence, Newport, Pawtucket, Woonsocket, (the largest in the State,) and the republican towns of Bristol, Warren, and Smithfield, embracing together more than half the population, gave majorities for the amendment. At that election, which was held on the day of the presidential vote, Gloucester gave 211 votes for Tilden and 20 for the amendment; West Greenwich, generally a democratic town, although at that election it gave a republican majority, returned 16 votes for the amendment, 46 for Tilden; Tiverton gave 2 votes for the amendment and 80 votes for Tilden; Exeter gave 6 for the amendment, 46 for Tilden. I think that at that trial the republican votes for the amendment were about equal to the democratic. It is certain that if the democrats had given it a unanimous or even a general support it would have prevailed.

It is not a republican doctrine or a democratic doctrine; it is a Rhode Island doctrine; a doctrine with which the people of all parties are deeply interested, and to which they are sincerely attached. It arises from the peculiar character of our population, which is singularly deficient in that class where experience proves that political power is most safely deposited, the agricultural class. A limited territory and an ungrateful soil restricts our farming population; the restless activity, the aggressive enterprise, and the ingenuity of the people have diversified our industry, and attracted a large manufacturing and mechanical population, much of it transient in its residence, and with less of local attachments than the natives of the soil. We believe that if we had the suffrage of New York City we should have the government of New York City; worse, that we should have such a government as that city would have if freed from the restraint of the rural population. At any rate the suffrage suits us, and it is no concern of outsiders.

RESTRICTIONS ON FOREIGN SUFFRAGE IN OTHER STATES.

Nor is ours the only State that discriminates against people of foreign birth.

Besides, the discrimination in the constitutions of New York, of Pennsylvania, and of Michigan, which, although lesser in amount, are the same in character, the State of California discriminates against a whole race, refusing them the hospitality of its shores; and this the race that inherits the oldest civilization extant, the subjects of that Emperor whose representatives were received in this Chamber with highest honors, whom your predecessor descended from the chair to welcome, and as a mark of respect to whom the Senate took a recess.

The people of California have lately voted against permitting the continuance of Chinese immigration, and have voted against it with a preponderance greater than that of some of the democratic towns in Rhode Island that I have quoted against free suffrage; no, not greater, for out of the 155,521 voters of California, 883 declared for the Chinese. But in two of the towns in Rhode Island not a vote was given for the extension of the elective franchise. I received, as we all did at the time of its date, the following communication from the governor of California:

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

SIR: The Legislature of this State, assuming that it was desirable that the wishes of the people of the State, upon the subject of Chinese immigration, should be unmistakably expressed, passed an act, approved December 21, 1877, entitled "An act to ascertain and express the will of the people of the State of California on the subject of Chinese immigration." This act provided for the submission to the electors of the State, at the next general election, the question of the continuance or prohibiton of Chinese immigration. It provided that such electors as should desire the continuance of Chinese immigration might express such desire by placing on their ballots the words "For Chinese immigration;" and that such electors as should desire the prohibition of Chinese immigration might place on their ballots the words "Against Chinese immigration."

This question was submitted to the voters of the State, in pursuance of the act above mentioned, at the general election held on the 3d day of September, 1879. At said general election there were chosen all State and county officers and members of the United States House of Representatives. The total vote cast at such election was 161,405 votes, which is several thousand more than the votes cast at any previous election in the State. It is probable, therefore, that the vote was as nearly full as it would be possible, under any circumstances, to secure. The vote was:

|---|---|
| For Chinese immigration | 883 |
| Against Chinese immigration | 154,638 |
| Voters who did not express any wish on the subject | 5,884 |

The conclusion from this vote is unavoidable, to wit: that the citizens of the State are substantially unanimous against the continuance of Chinese immigration.

The act above referred to further provides that the governor shall, after the vote on the question of Chinese immigration shall have been taken, make a statement of the question submitted to the electors and of the vote thereon, and forward copies of such statement, properly certified, to the President and Vice-President of the United States, to each Cabinet minister, Senator, Member of the House of Representatives, and to the governor of each State and Territory.

Now, for your information as to the actual sentiment of the citizens of this State touching the question of the continuance of Chinese immigration, and in pursuance of law, I have the honor to transmit to you the foregoing statement.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM IRWIN,
Governor.

THE LARGE FOREIGN IMMIGRATION IN RHODE ISLAND.

A political system is to be judged mainly by its results. If it works well upon those to whom it is applied, this is the strongest argument in its favor. It was attempted to be shown, before the committee, at Providence, that the restriction upon the foreign suffrage discouraged immigration. All the arguments, all the speculations, all the opinions to this effect are dissipated by the invincible arithmetic of the census. Under our suffrage laws the foreign-born population of the State has increased in a greater ratio than in any other of the "Old Thirteen," being 25.5 per cent. of the total number. New York exceeds it in this respect nominally by one-half of 1 per cent., the ratio in that State being 26 per cent. But New York contains the great port of immigration, and there are always present in that State thousands of immigrants, newly arrived, and only temporarily resident. Of the permanently resident, Rhode Island undoubtedly has a greater proportion than New York, and no other State equals it, even nominally. The following table furnishes the actual and relative number of persons of foreign birth in each of the Old Thirteen for the three last censuses. Previously to 1850 no account was taken of the nativity of the population in the enumeration of the census. I take the figures of the ninth census, as the returns of the census just concluded are not accessible:

Without drawing invidious comparisons with other States, it is enough to say that the foreign-born population of Rhode Island is unsurpassed by that of any other State in intelligence, in industry, in thrift, and in respectability. More than five thousand of them, males above the age of twenty-one years, are the holders of landed estates; and the possession of land is a most respectable thing in any man. The man who has bought a lot of land has acquired the habits of frugality. He casts about him for the means to erect upon it a home for himself and family. He sends his children to school; he improves himself and them, and sets an example to his fellow-citizens, which raises them as well as himself in the scale of respectability. Nor has there been any prejudice against electing foreign-born citizens to high trusts of honor and profit. They have been chosen to both houses of our General Assembly, to Congress, and to the general offices of the State. Our present secretary of State, eleven times successfully elected, is of foreign birth.

The deposits in the savings banks are regarded as a good criterion of the thrift and prosperity of the laboring classes of a community. In Rhode Island these deposits are largely held by the foreign-born citizens, who form a great part of our laboring population. These deposits in several of the most prosperous States are as follows:

|---|---|
| In New York the average deposit to population is | $65 15 |
| In Massachusetts the average deposit to population is | 128 95 |
| In Connecticut the average deposit to population is | 134 35 |
| In Rhode Island the average deposit to population is | 203 40 |

THE LIMITATION ON THE SUFFRAGE IN RHODE ISLAND DOES NOT PRACTICALLY AFFECT HER REPRESENTATION IN CONGRESS.

I think I have shown that neither the limitation upon the suffrage nor the mode of amendment provided in the constitution takes from Rhode Island the claim to a republican form of government, which the Federal Constitution guarantees to every State. Equally unfounded is the objection that our limitation upon the suffrage endangers our representation in the House of Representatives. The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that if the right to vote is denied to any of the male inhabitants of a State twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State. This undoubtedly reduces our representation in the proportion which the naturalized citizens disqualified by reason of the freehold requirement bears to the whole number of our male population of the requisite age. The number of naturalized citizens thus disqualified, as ascertained by the census, is a little over two thousand; and counting these against us, and not counting various other disqualifications which should equally reduce the representation in other States, the population of Rhode Island was found to be still sufficient to entitle us to a second Representative.

Number of male citizens of the United States residing in the State of Rhode Island June 1, 1870, who were reported in the United States census returns as "of twenty-one years of age and upward, whose right to vote is denied or abridged on other grounds than rebellion or other crime."

Almost or quite every State disqualifies citizens under this provision of the Federal Constitution. The requirement of the payment of a tax, of residence, of the ability to read and write, all deny or abridge the right to vote, for other reason than participation in the rebellion or other crime; and the number of citizens disqualified by these requirements must be deducted from the number of citizens of full age, in making the apportionment for the States in which these disqualifications prevail. Certainly if the representation of Rhode Island be reduced, at the next apportionment, in consequence of the limitations upon the suffrage in that State, a similar reduction must apply to Delaware, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Georgia, and Virginia, which require the payment of a tax as a qualification for suffrage; to Vermont, which requires the voter to take a freeman's oath that he will cast his vote with a regard to the best interests of the State; to Massachusetts, which requires the ability to read and write; to Connecticut, which requires the ability to read, and that the voter shall be of good moral character. In estimating the representative ratio of these States, the number failing to fulfill these conditions must be deducted.

Again, the qualification of residence differs largely in the several States. In most of them it is one year, but in Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, and Nevada, it is six months; in Kentucky it is two years; in Maine it is three months; in Minnesota it is four months. Michigan discriminates largely against citizens of foreign birth. The residence qualification in that State is three months for native citizens and two years and six months for foreigners, who have declared their intention to be naturalized. Pennsylvania discriminates not only against citizens born out of the country, but against citizens of the United States born out of Pennsylvania. The residence qualification for suffrage in Pennsylvania is one year, except for citizens of foreign birth, who must have been citizens of the United States for at least one month, and six months for natives of the State who have removed from it and returned.

Now, how shall all these differences be marshaled, so as to ascertain a standard by which to fix the suffrage, a standard of departure from which to estimate the disqualification? To require any term of residence is to abridge the right of suffrage; but if all the States required the same term the question would be easy of solution. Shall we take the standard of Maine, which is three months, and reckon, as an abridgment of the right of suffrage, all those who have resided three months in Kentucky, but are denied the right because they have not resided there two years? And shall we, in the States that require one year's residence, thus reckon those that have a residence of three months, but who lack the full term of one year? Shall we likewise reckon in Pennsylvania the naturalized citizens, otherwise qualified, who lack the requirement of thirty days' citizenship, and in New York those that lack ten days, and in Michigan those that lack that of two years and six months?

And shall we take the standard of that State, (Michigan,) which permits civilized Indians, natives of the United States, to vote, and take account of all persons of this class who are excluded from the suffrage in other States, and cut down the representative ratio accordingly? It will be readily seen that it is quite impossible to carry out this provision in all the States. And, if it cannot be carried out in all, it is manifestly unequal and unjust to apply it to one.

The law for taking the ninth census, the returns of which I have quoted, made no provision for taking the enumeration of the persons thus disfranchised. A constitutional provision does not generally execute itself; it requires the aid of an act of Congress or of the Executive. The very imperfect enumeration of these classes of citizens was undertaken, without the requirements of the law, which made no provision for it, and only because the Constitution seemed to require what the law had failed to prescribe the mode of doing.

The Superintendent of the Census and the Secretary of the Interior furnish official testimony to the worthlessness of the returns for the purpose of the fourteenth amendment. The Superintendent of the Census says in his report:

To schedule No. 1 two inquiries were added (Nos. 19 and 20) in compliance with what was believed to be the requirements of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. The first was intended to obtain the number of male citizens of the United States in each State of twenty-one years and upward. The second, to obtain the number of such citizens whose right to vote is denied or abridged on other grounds than rebellion or other crime. No anticipations were entertained that the results of these inquiries would be of value for the purpose for which directly they were introduced into the schedule, but it was believed that, in the absence of any legislative provision for determining these two classes of the population, in order to carry out the requirements of the fourteenth amendment, the Department would not be clear if it neglected to make the attempt, it being the only executive organ through which, without such special provision, the information could be obtained, and the present being the only time in ten years when the attempt could be made.

The census is not the proper agency for such an inquiry. The questions of citizenship and of the denial of suffrage to rightful citizens are mixed questions of law and fact, which an assistant marshal is not competent to decide. No particular value is attached to the results of these questions, so far as the original object is concerned, but incidentally it is believed information of value has been obtained. The count thus required of the total number of male citizens above twenty-one in each State, and in the United States, while it perhaps has not authority enough to be used in reducing the representative rights of a sovereign State, has yet been carefully made, and is believed to be as exact as most statistical results. The information is of a kind never before obtained in the country and has certainly an important bearing upon political philosophy and political history in the United States.

And the Secretary of the Interior fully indorses this in a communication to the House of Representatives, in which he says:

It is necessary to state, in transmitting these tables, that the Department is disposed to give but little credit to the returns made by assistant marshals in regard to the denial or abridgment of suffrage. The unfavorable judgment of the Department in respect to this single class of statistics is formed, first, from the application of certain statistical tests, and, second, from a consideration of the agencies employed, which are not deemed adequate to the determination of the numerous questions of difficulty and nicety which are involved.

DISQUALIFICATION OF CITIZENS.

Any reduction of our representation, in consequence of our peculiar suffrage, must equally apply to the States which require the payment of a tax as a qualification for voting, or exceptional length of residence, or education, or a good moral character. I should like to see the enumerator taking the census of the persons disqualified by that requirement. A distinguished citizen of Massachusetts has declared that the tax and educational qualifications in that State disfranchised a hundred thousand of its inhabitants, fifty times as many as the census returns render as disqualified by the real-estate qualification in Rhode Island. This gentleman estimates that, by the enforcement of the fourteenth amendment, the representation of Massachusetts would be reduced from eleven to eight. What reduction the strict application of the fourteenth amendment might make in the representation of other States, it would be difficult to calculate. It was estimated, in the debate on the last apportionment, that it would reduce the representation of two great States about one-half. On this point the late Mr. Kerr, afterward Speaker of the House of Representatives, said, (Congressional Globe, second session, Forty-second Congress, page 106:)

The fourteenth amendment was declared ratified on the 16th of June, 1866. Negro suffrage did not then exist in the States. It was denied by the States of the South. It became the policy of the Republican party and of Congress to require its adoption. The party and Congress hesitated at first to propose to enforce it directly. Hence the resort to the indirect mode contained in the section under consideration. It is punitive in its character and object. It practically said to the States, "Grant negro suffrage, or your representation here shall be reduced." It was the application of a sort of force to the States to compel them to accept the views of Congress. It was then never pretended by any one, in or out of Congress, that this section was intended to affect any States except such as might deny suffrage to some classes of its citizens on some ground of race, color, nationality, or other quality which inheres in and constitutes a part of the identity or individuality of the voter, on some ground which was a part of the man, was permanent and fixed in his person, in contradistinction from a mere regulation concerning the exercise of the right, such as previous residence, or registration, or the payment of taxes. Such is the history of its enactment.

It is proper further to appeal to contemporaneous construction in order to explain the doubtful or ambiguous language used in this section. It will thus appear that, after June 16, 1866, and long before the ratification of the fifteenth amendment, several States of the South were reorganized; new constitutions were formed by them; and those constitutions were submitted to the Congress of the United States for its ratification or approval. Those constitutions involved many provisions which, under the construction to-day put upon the second section of the fourteenth amendment, are in direct conflict with it. Notably, the constitution of the State of Georgia requires that electors, before they shall be allowed to vote, shall not only be registered, but shall have paid a certain tax. Other constitutions of the Southern States contain somewhat similar but not quite the same provisions. Those constitutions so framed and adopted by those people have been approved by Congress; they have been by you in this House solemnly adjudged to be not only "republican in form," but also in entire harmony with the Constitution of the United States, including the fourteenth amendment. It was never suggested by way of objection to any of them that their ratio of representation in this body ought to be reduced because they required the citizen to reside a certain length of time in the State before voting, or to go and have himself registered or lose his vote, or to pay a small poll-tax or be denied his vote. It was never intimated against them that such regulations of suffrage by any such States amounted to a denial or abridgment of the rights of suffrage for other causes than participation in rebellion, or for other crime.

On the 30th day of March, 1870, after nearly all of these constitutions had been framed, the fifteenth amendment was declared to have been ratified by three-fourths of the States of the Union. Why was the fifteenth amendment proposed to the States at all? I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the entire and single object of the fifteenth amendment was to accomplish by more direct, effective, and speedy means the very end proposed to be accomplished under the second section of the fourteenth amendment. The only difference is that under the second section of the fourteenth amendment it was proposed that by a sort of punitive regulation in the Constitution of the United States the States should be forced to grant suffrage to all their people without any distinctions based upon color or race or nationality, or any other cause or qualities that inhere in and constitute a part of the individuality of the voter. The adoption of this policy was considered to be too slow under the second section of the fourteenth amendment. The States did not receive very kindly the suggestion made in that section. Some of the States were not willing to follow it. They were willing possibly to suffer a reduction in their representation here rather than voluntarily adopt universal suffrage. Hence, the policy conceived and forced upon the country by the republican majority in Congress, of compelling by a fifteenth amendment the giving of suffrage to the negroes, was a practical abandonment of this second section, as ineffective and insufficient to accomplish the establishment of their policy on this subject in the South. Does not this latter amendment, therefore, in legal effect, supersede the second section of the fourteenth amendment?

I have looked in vain through the entire discussions that took place upon the fourteenth amendment to find one single utterance from the mouth of any gentleman on either side of this House which indicates an understanding in his mind at the time that the purpose of this second section was to require the States of this Union to surrender or cease to exercise their constitutional right without any consequent loss of representation here, to regulate the manner in which the suffrage should be enjoyed and exercised by their citizens, or to require that there should be certain previous residence in the State, district, and voting precinct, or that there should be a previous registration of the voters, or a previous payment of a poll-tax by the voter, or compliance with any other domestic regulation intended to regulate suffrage, protect the ballot-box, secure the purity of elections, and keep persons from voting who are not bona fide residents and citizens. Every State of the South and of the whole country does these things, and no question was ever before raised.

Viewing this section, then, in the light of these contemporaneous acts and constructions and expressions of opinion, intent, and purpose, I hold it to be clear that the sole object of this second section, both in the minds of its framers and in the light of its history and of sound reason, was and ought now to be held to be merely to prohibit the States of this Union from denying suffrage to any class of their citizens on any ground of race, or color, or nationality, or any other quality which inheres in the person and constitutes a part of the individuality of the voter. This construction is consistent with the idea of leaving some powers to the States, and not entirely sponging them out or reducing them to mere slavish dependence on the will of Congress.

When you give to the constitutional provision this construction you make it easy for the Congress of the United States to observe and enforce it. So long as you have reference alone to those limitations upon the right of suffrage which are of the character to which I have referred you find that the determination of the number of electors in each of the States thus deprived of suffrage becomes not only practicable, but easy and simple.

The census takers can then have no trouble in determining how many persons are denied the right of suffrage, and on what grounds—of race, color, nationality, or other cause pertaining to or existing in the persons of the voters. But if you hold, for example, that no State shall require the payment of a poll-tax as a condition-precedent to the exercise of suffrage, and then a State, as it appears now that the States of Georgia and Pennsylvania in fact do, declares that no citizen shall vote until he pays the required tax, and you attempt to determine the numbers of electors whose right is thus denied or abridged, how will you proceed, and what rule will you adopt? Will you say to those States that they shall have no representation here because the right of suffrage of all their citizens is abridged? Or will you attempt to ascertain the actual numbers who do not or cannot pay the required tax, and then reduce the representative rights of those States in Congress in that proportion? Or, take the State of Massachusetts, in which there is an intelligence qualification, and of Rhode Island, in which there is a property qualification required of voters. Will you attempt to ascertain how many voters in those States do not possess the requisite ability to read and write, or own the required amount of property, and then reduce their representation here proportionately?

But the men who cannot read and write to-day may do so a week hence, or at the next election; so the poor man may acquire the requisite property. It appears to me that any attempts of this kind would be most unsatisfactory and unsafe modes by which to settle the representation of a State in this House. But if these forbidden qualifications are limited to such as I have mentioned, the process becomes easy and simple. It must not be inferred that I approve the policy of the States of Massachusetts and Rhode Island in the regulation of suffrage there. I do not, but I think they retain the power to so regulate it without violation of the second section of the fourteenth amendment. I think this the better and safer construction of it. If, under this section, no disqualifications are considered as forbidden except such as relate to race, color, nationality, or other quality of the person, then there is no trouble, for these matters are permanent, fixed, and palpable, and easily ascertained. When a State requires of the voter residence, payment of taxes, ownership of some property, or previous registration, it does not absolutely deny or abridge suffrage, but only prescribes a mode by which the elector shall come into the actual enjoyment of it, shall exercise it, and leaves it always in the power of the elector by compliance to attain and exercise it. These regulations are in the nature of police regulations and only touch the manner of enjoyment.

This construction—not free from doubt, I agree—seems to me to be most in harmony with the spirit of the whole Constitution, the particular language in this section, and the rights and dignity of the States. It secures to the States the right to regulate their own domestic policy according to their own judgment.

Mr. Chairman, this construction enables us to proceed at once on the information we now have to make a just and fair apportionment. We need no delay, no further statistics, no angry attack upon any States, no departure from the golden rule of numbers in apportioning Representatives to the several States. It best maintains relations of equality and harmony among them. The statistics sent us from the Census Bureau of the number of persons in each State denied suffrage or abridged in its enjoyment for other reasons than participation in rebellion, or for other crime, are wholly unreliable and in my judgment of no value in this business. They do not inform us what the grounds of denial are in the respective States. They only inform the House that in each State there are certain numbers of persons who are denied the right of suffrage for reasons other than participation in crime or in the rebellion. For example, in my own State of Indiana this report shows six hundred and nine persons are denied the right to vote for other reasons than those named. When I state to gentlemen of this House why those six hundred and nine are denied the right to vote I think they will agree that it was never intended by this amendment that you should deduct those persons from the basis of representation. Those six hundred and nine persons are idiots or insane persons disqualified by the laws of nature.

Are we to be punished in our representation here for the State of Indiana because we do not suffer those insane and idiotic persons to go to the polls and vote? It is equally true, I have no doubt, that a large per cent. of all these denials in all the other States is for these same reasons of idiocy and insanity. And shall it be said that a State shall be denied representation here because it prescribes the qualification of sanity as a basis for a right to vote—because its law recognizes sanity as needful for the safe and proper exercise of the sacred franchise of suffrage? Surely that will not be attempted.

It may be said by gentlemen on the other side that if we concede the right of a State to require the payment of a tax at all it follows logically that a State may require the payment of a tax of any amount it pleases, and thus may make the amount of the tax an engine of oppression and tyranny. In reply I have only to say that from arguments of that kind Congress does not and cannot acquire power. We must get our power from the letter and from the intent and meaning of the Constitution. If a State government attempts an act of that kind, it will become instantly odious in the State itself, and its own people will combine and agitate against it, and require that such legislation shall be reversed, and that the popular rights of the people of the country in the matter of suffrage shall be protected and maintained under all circumstances. But I say that those regulations to which I have referred, including this one, are not intended to deny to any classes the right of suffrage absolutely or unconditionally. It appears to me fair to assume that the effect, the legal and constitutional effect, of the ratification of the fifteenth amendment, as I before said, is to supersede and practically to do away with the second section of the fourteenth amendment; because, under the fifteenth amendment, no State hereafter can do any of those things which would involve a denial of the right of suffrage to classes of its people for reasons based upon color, or race, or nationality, or any qualities that belong to them personally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WHYTE in the chair.) The morning hour has expired.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senator have leave to conclude.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks that unanimous consent be granted to the Senator from Rhode Island to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Rhode Island will proceed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I agree with Mr. Kerr, that the construction which he puts upon the constitutional provision is "not free from doubt." Nor can any construction, practicable of execution, be put upon it that is free from doubt. It requires the advice of a lawyer, in each individual case, and is a matter far beyond the capacity of an ordinary census enumerator; nor would it be at all practicable to obtain a just and legal enunciation of the disqualification under it. Mr. Kerr's construction is rather an exposition of what the provision should be, or is intended to be, than what it really is. Yet it is the best that seems to be obtainable. We have no reason, therefore, to apprehend that the denial or abridgment of the right of suffrage, in our State, will work against us in the apportionment more than similar denial or abridgment, for other reasons, will work against other States; nor that any reduction will thereby be made in our representation that will not apply in as great or greater degree to most of the other States.

In the course of the debate upon the resolution, which is the foundation of these reports, something was said upon this question of the right of Rhode Island to the representation which she enjoys in the other House of Congress; and Senators representing larger States saw fit to sneer at her for the narrow limits of her territory and the paucity of her population. Her territory is as large as it was when she entered the Union; entered it, not admitted into it, by the grace of Congress, as were some of the larger States, whose representatives on this floor have not deemed it in bad taste to make themselves merry at her size; not acquired by purchase, without consulting the population whose allegiance was violently transferred; not wrung, by conquest, from a neighboring power; but entered it, of her own free will, and of her own right, as one of the Old Thirteen, that together achieved the independence of the country, and made us a nation.

EQUAL REPRESENTATION SECURED BY THE CONSTITUTION.

Her equal representation in this body is secured to her by the common Constitution, on which the largest States depend for the definition of their rights and the protection of their liberties. Her representation in the other House is given to her by the law made in pursuance of that Constitution. I do not deem it needful to defend her rights to either. Comparison between States, never decorous in either branch of the Government, are especially inappropriate in this Chamber, where the Senators are the equal representatives of equal States. But the discussion is forced upon us, and we meet it. Claiming nothing for myself, personally, yet as representing, in part, the State of Rhode Island, I deem myself the peer of any Senator, however numerous his constituents, and spread over however many miles of territory, he may have at his back. It has been said that our suffrage includes but 24,000 voters, and that, therefore, we are not entitled to two Representatives in the House. Representation is not based by the Constitution upon voters, but upon numbers, with the restriction of the fourteenth amendment, which, I have already shown, does not cut down our representative population, below the limit that entitles us to a second Representative, not even when the reduction made by this amendment is applied to us, and not to other States, to which it is equally applicable. We are entitled, therefore, to our two Representatives by the strict construction of the Constitution and the law. The ratio of representation is 134,675, and the fraction of Rhode Island, after deducting this number from her representative population, was found to be sufficient to entitle her to a second Representative under the law. Holding one Representative by virtue of a fraction, she is not expected to have the same number of voters as a State that receives two Representatives on a full ratio.

But while I utterly deny the pertinency of the argument adduced against the representation of Rhode Island, I may ask, why is a rule suggested against that State which is not applied to other States? If the representation in the House were based on voters, instead of on population, the political majority would be largly reversed, for the number of persons who voted for the Republican minority in that body exceed the number who voted for the majority by more than two hundred thousand. I have here a list of congressional districts, every one of them democratic, that gave less than ten thousand votes each at the last election of Representatives:

And the tenth district of Tennessee returned 10,078 votes.

Here are eighteen districts that returned an average of 6,246 votes. Why is it not complained that the States in which these districts are situated are overrepresented? But Senator after Senator, from those States, rose and said that in those districts there was practically no opposition. Does it not occur to them that this may be true in Rhode Island? In the first district of Rhode Island, the more populous, but where the vote was the smaller, there was practically no contest. The vote might have been doubled with a severe contest.

The whole number of voters in Rhode Island is 42,741. The number returned as voting for members of Congress was 18,461. Bristol County, with a voting population of 1,871, returned a vote of 830; Coventry, with a voting population of 901, returned 494; Warwick with 1,775 voters, returned 1,154; Newport, with 2,232, returned 716; Burrillville, with 772, returned 501; Cranston, with 995, returned 395; East Providence, with 812, returned 370; Lincoln, with 1,124, returned 569; Pawtucket, with 2,757, returned 1,471; Scituate, with 882, returned 348; Providence City, with 16,631, returned 5,636; North Kingstown, with 893, returned 460; South Kingstown, with 979, returned 472, and Westerly, with 1,001, returned 495.

The State census of 1875 returns the number of votes at 42,741, of whom 5,364 were of foreign birth. The Senators from the States to which I have referred say that their voters have a right to stay at home and refrain from voting. Have not the voters of Rhode Island an equal right? And in Rhode Island no voter is kept from the polls by violence or intimidation. Can the Senators from those States say the same?

Nor is Rhode Island the only State that receives an additional Representative by virtue of a fraction? Sixteen other States are represented in the same way. They are:

LIMITATIONS OF THE SUFFRAGE LEFT TO THE STATES.

The limits of the suffrage, within the provisions of the Federal Constitution, are left to the States; they prescribe its bounds and fix its conditions. These conditions vary in the different States, according to the pleasure of each, and so long as they do not violate the Constitution of the United States—as the suffrage of Rhode Island clearly does not—the other States and the General Government have no concern in them. Especially do the qualifications for the suffrage of citizens of foreign birth differ in the different States, as I have already shown. In some, not even naturalization is required, and only a residence of three months. This I regard as a shameful abuse of the right of suffrage; but it is no concern of mine or of any other persons, without the States where it prevails. In New York City, the chief port of immigration, when an emigrant ship arrives on the day of election, it is said that the passengers march, or did march, before the passage of the supervisor law, from the ship to the polls, and with forged naturalization papers put into their hands, vote before they have learned to perjure themselves in intelligible English.

But while I hold that this discussion is wholly impertinent to this Chamber, while I base the right of Rhode Island to her representation upon the Constitution and the laws, and deny the right of any one, here or elsewhere, to question it, I will, since the question has been raised, present some facts to show that she is not unworthy of the Union of which she is a member. Her territory is to the area of the Union as 1 to 1,361; her population is as 1 to 175. Her territory is well filled, and she is the most densely populated State in the Union, her population being 206 to the square mile—I take the census of 1870, with the extent of territory corrected; that of 1875 returns 244—while that of the whole country, Territories excluded, is 21 to the square mile, of the Old Thirteen 49 to the square mile. This exceeds in density the population, not only of any other State in the Union, but of Spain, Austria, Prussia, or France, and very largely of the average of Europe. She is the thirty-eighth State in respect to territory, the thirty-second in respect of population, and when the internal taxes were highest, she was the tenth in her return of internal revenue to the Federal Government. With a population of 217,353, by the census of 1870, her contribution to the Treasury from internal taxes was greater than those of California with 560,247; than Indiana with 1,680,637; than Kentucky with 1,321,011; than Michigan with 1,184,059; lacking but $75,875.27 of as much as Louisiana with a population of 726,915; more than double the amount returned by Tennessee with 1,258,520; four times as much as West Virginia with more than double her population. With one-twentieth the population of New York she returned more than one-twelfth as much internal revenue; with one-tenth the population of Pennsylvania she returned more than one-seventh as much revenue; with one-eleventh the population of Illinois she returned more than one-third, nearly 40 per cent. as much internal revenue. The congressional district in which I live returned a greater amount than either one of twenty-three States of the Union. When the city of Chicago was devastated by the awful visitation of fire, and the sympathies of the whole people were aroused, Rhode Island, although the thirty-second State in population, and, although her insurance offices suffered, some of them to their ruin, by the disaster, and although her whole business community shared, directly and indirectly, in the terrible calamity, she was the eighth State in the amount of her contributions for the relief of her distressed fellow-citizens; and when the pestilence broke out in the South her heart and her hand were alike open.

I refer to these statistics, not to justify the right of Rhode Island to her representation in the House of Representatives—her right to that rests on the law, and she would be equally entitled to it if none of these were true—but I refer to them to show that she is not unworthy of the privileges that she enjoys. National greatness is not reckoned by the square mile, nor are State rights computed by the acre.

Thus, at greater length than I have expected, yet leaving many points untouched and others slightly elaborated, I have endeavored to defend the institutions of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, and which have been assailed by those who have no authority over them, and misrepresented by those who have no concern in them. Our institutions may be peculiar; our people are peculiar, and they have the right to enjoy their peculiarities. They are satisfied with the government which their fathers ordained, and which they have maintained. That this government is not distasteful to others is proved by the large addition made to our population, from the neighboring States and from foreign countries, till it has become the most densely populated State in the Union. When the people become weary of their form of government they will, in their own way, in their own time, and at their own pleasure, change it; but so long as they are content with it, and it does not infringe upon the Constitution, which is the supreme law over us all, they will not alter it at the dictation of those who neither enjoy its benefits nor suffer its evils.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. GARLAND. I gave notice of a motion to take up the Geneva award bill to-day, but the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has been called out of his seat on account of sickness, and he desires to be here when it is taken up. I now give notice that I will call up the bill on Tuesday.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask that the pending order, the Post-Office appropriation bill, be taken up, and I give notice to the Senate that I shall ask them to "sit it out" to-day; I want it disposed of this afternoon.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HAMLIN to the amendment of Mr. PUGH, to strike out all after the words "Postmaster-General," in line 3, and in lieu thereof to insert:

> And the Postmaster-General is authorized, after due public competition, to enter into contract with the lowest responsible bidders, for terms of ten years, for such transportation between such home and foreign ports as he may in his discretion designate, in order best to promote the postal and commercial interests of the United States, in iron steamships wholly owned by American citizens and registered in American registry, such ships to be duly inspected under the direction of the Postmaster-General and Secretary of the Navy, and be equal in construction, accommodations, safety, and speed to the best vessels on the ocean carrying mails to the same ports, at a rate of compensation not exceeding $30 per mile, one way, for twelve round trips per annum, or the same proportionate rate for a quarter or less number of trips per annum; such contracts to contain all provisions for securing efficient service which may be customary and required by law in such cases. One-fourth part of the appropriation herein made shall be made applicable to ports on the Pacific coast, one-fourth part to ports lying south of and including Fortress Monroe and ports on the Gulf of Mexico, and one-half to ports lying north of Fortress Monroe.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I beg to say a very few words in relation to the amendment which I have proposed. It does not materially vary from the committee's amendment in its scope, but I have offered it in the belief that it is a little better guarded and is a little better calculated to effect the object than the amendment reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. That amendment provides no manner in which the Postmaster-General shall enter into his contracts; the amendment which I have offered does provide that it shall be on public competition, and then to the lowest bidder. I propose to modify my amendment by adding after the word "public," in the second line, the words "advertisement and;" so as to read:

> And the Postmaster-General is authorized, after due public advertisement and competition, to enter into contracts, &c.

It varies from the amendment of the Post-Office Committee in that it provides for public advertisement and then that the contract shall be let to the lowest bidder; and it varies from the amendment of the Post-Office Committee again in the condition that no contract exceeding $30 per nautical mile shall be entered into by the Postmaster-General, making that the maximum amount, while the amendment of the Post-Office Committee names no sum and leaves it entirely discretionary with the Postmaster-General. This makes a limitation.

I always mean to be frank in my legislative capacity, and I will state distinctly what my understanding of the amendment which I offer is. It would comport more with my judgment if the word "built" was inserted, so that these iron steamships should be required to be built and wholly owned by American citizens. I excluded that, however, from the amendment, and with a purpose. There are propositions to allow ships to be purchased by citizens of this country built in foreign countries. I think it would be a disastrous thing to allow that to be done. That proposition is not now before us, and I am not going to discuss it; but, supposing a majority of Congress should be of the opinion that it is a wise thing to do and it should be done, if the words "American built" were here, they could not participate in this mail service; but if the words "American built" be not here, then if the principle of "free ships" be adopted they would come within the language of this provision. There is that latitude to Senators who are in favor of "free ships." If we adopt this amendment and that at any time it shall be deemed a wise policy, or if the Government shall at any time enact a law by which foreign-built vessels may be admitted into this country, they would come in then on equal terms with other vessels under the provisions of this amendment. Otherwise than in guarding the manner of the exercise of power by the Postmaster-General as to making contracts under advertisement and limiting him in the amount of compensation which shall be paid, I believe my amendment is in essence and in spirit the amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and for this reason I have offered it.

Mr. MORRILL. Before the Senator from Maine sits down I desire to get a little information, because I am anxious to vote for something of this kind. I desire in the first place to ask him whether he proposes to increase the amount that shall be left in the hands of the Postmaster-General above a million dollars?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not.

Mr. MORRILL. Then, as it seems to be confined one-half of the sum, that is, $500,000, to places above the port of Norfolk, I desire to ask the Senator how much of service that would get? As I figure it, it would give six trips of one vessel from New York to Liverpool and no more. The amendment provides that the pay shall be not over $30 per mile; it being at least 3,000 miles from the port of New York to Liverpool, it would consequently require $90,000 for each trip. Therefore it would pay for only about six or less than six trips for one vessel from New York to Liverpool. I may not understand the amendment aright, but if I do that is the result of it.

Mr. HAMLIN. The amount of money appropriated here is a very little portion of that for which I would gladly vote. I would triplicate it; I would add largely to it; and I would do so in the belief that I was subserving the best interests of a common country in all its parts, believing that those sections of the country who are owners of the lesser portion of the navigation are still more interested than the Northern Atlantic States; but we are seeking to inaugurate a policy which we believe is in the very best interests of the country, a policy which we think will be a commencement of the revival of our commercial marine. Whether we be erroneous in our opinions or not, such is our belief. We take this small sum to try to inaugurate a policy; and if we do not get all of the service which we would desire and all which we want and all which I believe is actually needed, we can at least make a commencement. But my friend from Vermont puts his figures at the full sum. Under competition, I am in the hope that a less sum than $30 a mile may be found sufficient to commence this service; but if we get only a monthly service once a month, performing but six trips in the year each way, I am for it. We favor this sum only as a commencement of a system. We may succeed with this, while we might not with a larger sum.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WHYTE in the chair.) The Senator from Pennsylvania reserved all points of order yesterday when this amendment was proposed.

Mr. WALLACE. I raise the point of order under the twenty-ninth rule that I raised to the other amendment, and this is more in the nature of general legislation than that was; indeed, on its face it is nothing but legislation. I shall not attempt to debate it before the Senate, but simply submit the question to the Senate, and ask the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will only say in relation to my amendment, that it is in order precisely as every amendment is in order that is reported by the Committee on Appropriations. It is just as much in order as all the amendments which that committee offer that change an existing law. It may be said that no question of order has been raised on that committee's amendments. My answer is, that the long practice of the Senate settles the meaning of the rule to be that on an appropriation bill an amendment pertinent to the bill is proper. The Committee on Appropriations have so regarded it in this bill, and in all other bills, and hence have added so much legislation as is necessary to shape and direct the expenditure of the appropriations in the bill. This amendment does that; it does no more, and it is therefore in order.

Mr. WALLACE. The answer of the Senator from Maine perhaps would be a correct one if this did not do what the appropriation bill does in no regard. It extends to a contract for more than one year; it provides that the Government shall be bound for ten years by a contract to be entered into, and therefore it is much more obnoxious to the charge of general legislation than the other provisions, which relate solely to the appropriation for the year 1882.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, let me ask my friend, as he passes along, if it is not rather a limitation than an extension of the original proposition? The Postmaster-General might make a contract for twenty years under that, as there is no limitation, while this does limit him.

Mr. WALLACE. But the amount of money expended under the enacting words of the bill is to be confined to money appropriated for the service of the Post-Office Department for the next fiscal year; and at the end of that fiscal year, unless the provisions of the bill itself authorize an extension beyond the fiscal year, the appropriation drops; but here is a provision which carries into effect for ten years this contract, and binds the Government for the whole of the money to carry it out. I suppose that after this amendment goes on, the next movement of the Senator will be to increase the amount of the appropriation. If it is to be retained simply at the amount of $1,000,000, with all these ports to be supplied, and to extend over a period of ten years, there would be rather a homeopathic dose of subsidy. It would not amount to very much in regard to caring for our commerce to foreign ports.

But it does seem to me, Mr. President, that the whole of this proposition is broadly within the rule, and in the performance of my duty I raise the point that it is general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that this amendment is out of order, but at the request of any Senator he will submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Chair to submit the question to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection has been made to this amendment under the twenty-ninth rule, and the question is submitted to the Senate whether the amendment is in order or not. Those in favor of the reception of the amendment as in order will say "ay," those of the contrary opinion "no."

Mr. INGALLS. This is the same question, I suppose, that was raised on the amendment reported from the Post-Office Committee by the Senator from Texas that was voted upon last evening, and on which I voted to sustain the decision of the Chair, that the amendment was not in order. During the debate upon the subject, the Senator from Arkansas, who is not now in his seat, [Mr. GARLAND,] quoted with approbation and as having the force of law a previous decision of the Senate upon the same question that has been raised at other sessions, and he read from a "compilation" of the clerk "upon questions of order and decisions thereon under the rules of the Senate since their adoption, January 17, 1877."

I advert to this subject for the purpose of expressing the hope that no Senator will be restrained from voting as he may see fit on this amendment upon the ground that any precedent has been established by previous action of the Senate; for if the Senator from Arkansas had taken the trouble to have read a dozen more lines on the same page from which he quoted he would have found that the same question proposed by the same Senator under the same rule was decided exactly the opposite way. I read from page 4 of this compilation. The Senator from Arkansas quoted as follows:

> Mr. EDMUNDS raised a question of order, namely, that the amendment proposed general legislation to a general appropriation bill, and under the twenty-ninth rule of the Senate was not in order.
> The PRESIDING OFFICER submitted the question of order to the Senate.—Senate Journal, second session Forty-fifth Congress, page 504.
> Determined in the negative—yeas 23, nays 32.

Below, upon the same page and under the same subdivision, appears the following:

> Whereupon,
> Mr. EDMUNDS raised a question of order that the amendment proposed general legislation to a general appropriation bill, and could not be received under the first clause of the twenty-ninth rule. Question submitted to the Senate and determined in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 26.—Senate Journal, third session Forty-fifth Congress, page 319.

So that at different sessions of the same Congress the same question submitted by the same Senator was decided in exactly the opposite way. I make this remark for the purpose of relieving any Senator from the question of propriety or of consistency that may arise, and for the purpose of saying further that any Senator who will examine the precedents upon these questions of order will find an elaborate number of very able-bodied decisions upon both sides of every question that can be raised under the rules.

I am clearly of opinion, as I was upon the question that was raised last night, that the amendment is not in order under the twenty-ninth rule and that the decision of the Chair is correct and should stand as the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have said heretofore and on several occasions that we can show a precedent for any ruling by this Senate, especially on the standing rules. The same is true also of the House and of all legislative bodies. According to our practice, a decision made by this Senate is authority only in the case decided, and only for that vote. A contrary decision and a contrary vote is in order the next day. The Senate makes no decision on rules which the Senate is bound to respect. I believe I may say, judging by our practice, that nothing is res adjudicata in this Senate but a vote which tramples on the Constitution and denies to a State her equal suffrage in this body. Such a vote as that, I believe, is held to be sacred and utterly beyond review. Nothing else is binding on the Senate. Everything else can be changed, modified, reviewed, and corrected at will; but a decision or vote, with or without investigation, that a mob is a Legislature can never be reviewed or reversed, however absurd and against facts and the Constitution it may be.

It has been ruled by the Senate that the amendment to which this is an amendment is in order. That was the decision of the Senate yesterday. I thought the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. PUGH,] which was reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] originally, was in order; I so voted, and the Senate has concurred by a large majority, a vote of 29 to 15, in saying that that amendment is in order. Under the rules and under parliamentary law an amendment to an amendment is always in order. This amendment offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] is not an amendment to the original bill; it is not an original amendment; it is an amendment to an amendment, as I understand; it is an amendment offered to an amendment, which has been ruled to be in order.

Mr. INGALLS. But does the Senator from Georgia mean to be understood that therefore, on that account, because it is offered as an amendment to an amendment that has been held to be in order, the amendment is necessarily in order under the rule?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have not said so.

Mr. INGALLS. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator so held.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I only suggest that either that or this will follow, to wit: that you cannot move to amend an amendment to an appropriation bill. A proper amendment to an amendment ought to be in order if the original amendment is in order. I do not see exactly the answer to that. I am simply calling the attention of the Senate and of the Senator from Kansas to that point. Is the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine a proper amendment under the general parliamentary rule to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama? If the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama is not obnoxious to the twenty-ninth rule, how is an amendment to that amendment obnoxious to the same rule? That is the point I make.

I do not know that I care particularly how this vote goes. I have no special feeling one way or the other. I scarcely know how I myself will vote on the amendment to the amendment; but on the simple question of order, the point I propose to the gentleman who was doubting whether this amendment was in order, is that this is not an amendment to the original bill; it is an amendment to an amendment, and that original amendment has been ruled by the Senate to be in order. Now, I believe, under parliamentary rules, an amendment to an amendment is always in order where the amendment itself is properly receivable, where it is germane. Now, the Senate having ruled the original amendment moved by the Senator from Texas in order, how does it happen that there is anything to prevent the application of the other rule, the general rule that an amendment to an amendment is in order? If the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine is itself a proper amendment under the general rule, how can you make this amendment to the amendment out of order under the twenty-ninth rule, when under the twenty-ninth rule the original amendment is held to be in order?

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask a question to understand the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator maintain that an amendment being offered to an appropriation bill which is manifestly in order, against which no point of order could be made, then to that amendment any amendment whatever is in order, provided it falls within general parliamentary law, notwithstanding the rule of the Senate? Perhaps I do not make myself understood.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator has asked precisely the same question which the Senator from Kansas has already asked.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Senator's pardon; I have been out of the Chamber for a moment and I had not heard the previous debate. My purpose was to understand the Senator myself. Doubtless the Senator from Kansas already understands him. I should like to know whether the argument of the Senator is that an amendment being in order to an appropriation bill, notwithstanding the rules of the Senate, any amendment to that amendment is in order provided the general parliamentary law does not exclude it?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will say to the Senator from New York, as I said to the Senator from Kansas, I have not decided whether that could be so or not. I am simply calling the attention of the Senate to the point. It is a new point to me, I confess. It is one I have never seen raised before. That is the reason why I call the attention of the Senate to it, and I am glad the distinguished Senator from New York is taking an interest in it. I have never seen this condition of things exist before in the Senate or in any other legislative body. Here is an appropriation bill. Under the twenty-ninth rule an amendment is prohibited which proposes general legislation. An amendment has been offered which was objected to because it proposed general legislation. The Senate has ruled distinctly, by a vote of nearly two to one, that that amendment is not obnoxious to Rule 29, which prohibits that specific character of amendment. Then the Senator from Maine offers an amendment to that amendment which, under the general parliamentary law, is a proper amendment to that amendment. The objection is made that the amendment to the amendment is not in order under the twenty-ninth rule.

Mr. CONKLING. How, under the Senator's argument, can that point be made? If an amendment to an amendment does not fall within the rule, how could the question be raised against the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is precisely what I am inquiring. The Senator will understand me. I am only making my point as one of inquiry. I want to see how it can be raised. That is the very point. How can it be raised?

My point is, the original amendment being in order you cannot raise the point of order on the amendment to the amendment. If you could, this state of things might arise: suppose the point of order was not made on the amendment to the amendment, and it should be adopted as an amendment to the amendment, then if it is held to be general legislation it becomes immediately obnoxious under the twenty-ninth rule, and the Senate would defeat the whole proposition to amend, and thereby defeat by one amendment proper in itself another amendment which the Senate had previously held to be proper. By this process an amendment which has been declared by the Senate to be in order gets out of order by being amended in a proper parliamentary way. Is not this giving an effect to Rule 29 which was not intended?

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator allow me to put an inquiry for information?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERNAN. Assuming that the Senator believed that the original amendment from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads did not propose general legislation, and therefore that it was in order, and supposing the Senator believed that an amendment to that amendment is one proposing general legislation, is not the amendment to the amendment out of order?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is the very question I am asking. The junior Senator from New York, the senior Senator from New York, and the Senator from Kansas have all asked me questions that I am asking the Senate to answer.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend permit me to say a word to him? I suggest that the great difficulty is here, that the amendment reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was taken into consideration at all. An amendment has been offered; the Senate has said that amendment is in order; a proposition is made to amend the amendment. The only question is, is the amendment of the Senator from Maine in order without any regard to the previous amendment whatever? In other words, if this were an independent proposition which is offered by the Senator from Maine it must be determined whether it is obnoxious to the rule without any regard to the original amendment which has been offered. Such, I apprehend, is a fair version of this whole matter, and will take us all out of the trouble.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I seriously question that conclusion, and for this reason: I do not think that the twenty-ninth rule was intended for any purpose but to secure the consideration by the Committee on Appropriations to a proposed amendment. That consideration has been secured to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas and it has been ruled in order. If you rule that the amendment of the Senator from Maine is not in order, you thereby rule that an amendment to an amendment is not in order, although it is germane and proper in itself.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me, I am in favor of the amendment in question, but in regard to the doctrine that the Senator is advancing as regards the proposition that an amendment in the second degree is not covered by Rule 29, I think the Senator labors under the mistake of not keeping in mind the fact that the rule does not consider the degrees of the amendment but simply applies to amendments whether in the first or second degree. If the Senator's proposition is correct, any amendment could be put upon an appropriation bill by first moving an amendment that is in order and then moving to amend that, which would be in the second degree, by a proposition which is out of order.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, I do not hold any such thing, but I think it reasonable to hold that any amendment which under the general parliamentary law is a proper amendment to an amendment which has been ruled in order could be put in. That is what I suggest and that is all. I do not hold that any amendment could be moved. I do not say myself that the view I suggest is conclusive. Indeed I have said it is one of inquiry. It is a new point. I never heard it raised in a legislative body before, and I am willing for Senators to dispose of it as they please.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the language of rule 29:

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

In the decision pronounced by the Senate yesterday evening the Senate must have decided that the amendment reported by the Senator from Texas did not contain general legislation. Hence, it seems to me, the only question involved in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine is, whether it does or does not contain general legislation, wholly independent of the amendment reported by the Senator from Texas, because if the amendment of the Senator from Texas contains general legislation, it was directly in violation of the first clause of Rule 29 to have received it at all. Therefore the Senate must have decided by the vote of yesterday evening that that amendment contained no general legislation. The question now is, does the amendment of the Senator from Maine contain general legislation?

Mr. GARLAND. Yesterday evening the Senate determined that the amendment reported by the Senator from Texas did not propose general legislation. The Senator from Pennsylvania having in charge this bill, as a matter of course, accepted the decision of the Senate, and admitted that to be true. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] proposed an amendment, "to strike out after the words 'Postmaster-General,' in line 3, all of the amendment and insert as follows," which his amendment is. Upon that the Senator from Pennsylvania says, "While I accept the decision as to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, and agree that in the judgment of the Senate it does not propose general legislation, yet the amendment of the Senator from Maine does not propose general legislation." That is all there is in the question.

If the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia is correct, and you get your amendment in, you may strike out all after the first word and put in the Geneva award bill, the Indian severalty bill, and all the rest of the bills—the pension bills, too—and the Ten Commandments, my friend from Pennsylvania suggests. There is no difficulty in this question, according to my understanding of it.

Mr. HARRIS. The question of relevancy or whether germane or not would arise.

Mr. GARLAND. That might arise; but I am speaking now of this particular point, and that is all I can discuss at one time. The Senator from Pennsylvania says now, and as I state the proposition there is no difficulty about it: "I accept the decision of the Senate and agree that the amendment of the Senator from Texas contains no general legislation." So far so good. The Senator from Maine now proposes this amendment. But, says the Senator from Pennsylvania, "I think that does contain general legislation, and I object to it under Rule 29." I am very much afraid the Senator from Pennsylvania is right about it, coming now to the question before the Senate, because it makes a general provision for ten years in reference to this specific business, and goes beyond the period of the appropriation. I am rather afraid that he is correct about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so decided the point of order upon that view of the case, and then submitted the question to the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to say one word and but one word. The amendment which I have offered is a limitation upon every single thing that is contained in the amendment offered by the Post-Office Committee. It confines the Postmaster-General to ten years; the other leaves the term of the contract indefinite. The Post-Office Committee amendment authorizes the Postmaster-General to enter into the service; my amendment provides the mode and manner in which he shall do so. The amendment of the Post-Office Committee has no limitation as to what shall be paid for the service; my amendment prescribes the amount, fixes a maximum. There is not a single thing in my amendment that is not a limitation on the Post-Office Committee's amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. As I shall vote that this amendment is in order, I will state very briefly the reasons why I do so, inasmuch as some question has been made on the floor of the Senate by gentlemen with whom I am in the habit of concurring on questions of this kind.

When the Senate ruled that $1,000,000 might be added to this bill for additional postal service to foreign countries, it then declared, in my opinion, that it was competent to make such regulations as to the expenditure of that $1,000,000 as might be found convenient and proper for the benefit of the mail service and the benefit of the country. That $1,000,000, if expended under existing laws without any change or modification, would have to be expended in the payment of postages and not under contracts, as I understand; or at least that construction might be given. There is no regulation which precisely bears upon this question in the existing statutes, because the existing statutes authorizes the appropriation of postages only to mail pay for sea service.

We now add to that fund a million dollars in money; and the question is, how shall we apply that million dollars which we add to the postages, for I do not understand that this amendment if adopted or this bill when passed will supersede the existing regulation or law which authorizes the Postmaster-General to contract for the carrying of mails from any port of the United States to any foreign port, and paying for the transportation of the mails by the postages that shall be received upon that route. That system will stand. That system authorizes the mails to be carried in steamships or in sailing-vessels, according as the Postmaster-General may determine to be the best method. That system is not affected by this provision of law which we now propose to enact, as I understand it, but this is a new provision, adding to the mail facilities of the United States. It is a provision for the extension of the mail service to the high seas under the contract system, and that is all. We undertake to extend this service to the high seas under the contract system, and yet it is not mentioned in the proposed law that it shall be under the contract system.

The real point upon which I understand objection is made to this amendment is that it authorizes contracts to be made for a period of ten years for carrying the mail. That is the substantial part of it, because in other respects the amendment of the Senator from Maine is very much in harmony with the amendment to the bill proposed by the Senator from Texas. Section 3956 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

> No contract for carrying the mail shall be made for a longer term than four years, and no contract for carrying the mail on the sea shall be made for a longer term than two years.

A contract for carrying the mail on the sea, under the provisions of this statute, is a contract to be paid for by transferring the postages, and those contracts are limited to two years. The Senate has now declared that contracts may be made to be paid for, not in postages, but in money, to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, precisely as mail pay is granted from the Treasury upon contracts on land.

Having so far held that we have the right to appropriate this million of dollars, then two questions arise: shall we appropriate this million dollars under contract; and shall we extend the time of the contract from two to ten years? In order to appropriate it by contract we have merely to grant the appropriation, because the provision of law is here now that contracts may be made for two years, to be paid for in postages. If we add money to it, that provision of law stands to warrant the contract to be paid in money to be appropriated out of the Treasury. The only remaining question, therefore, is, have we the right, in the appropriation of this million dollars, so to regulate the appropriation of that sum of money as that it shall apply to contracts to be made for ten years?

I really can see no difficulty in the rule of the Senate. The Senate may proceed to put that condition upon the expenditure of the money if it sees proper to do so. It might not choose to risk a million dollars in the hands of the Postmaster-General from which so little of public permanent benefit might be expected as would be derived if the contracts were to last for only two years, and it might be a wise provision of law if in the application of this million dollars the contract should be made for a longer period than two years. What general legislation is there in that? What else is there in it than the removal of difficulties that exist under the law to the efficient use of this money in the public service?

I think there is a misconception in the Senate as to the scope and purposes of this measure generally. It is not a measure to create a new system. Under the Constitution of the United States it is confided exclusively to the Congress of the United States to establish mail service anywhere and everywhere. No one has ever dreamed that mail service might not be extended to foreign countries over the seas. We have passed laws which are upon the statute-books to provide for it, and in order to make the service only the more efficient we propose so to modify the application of those laws to the particular arrangement that we are making now as to authorize a contract to be made for ten years instead of for two.

I very much prefer, if we are undertaking a system of this kind, that both sides should have a fair opportunity to test it; that both sides should have a fair chance, the contractor and the Government; for it is no small matter to get up an iron steamship for the purpose of transporting mails. A man would scarcely be likely to do a thing of that sort knowing his contract was to be ended under the law in two years.

Therefore I shall vote with the Senator from Maine that his amendment is in order.

Mr. WALLACE. I want the Senate to understand fully the point I make in regard to this amendment. When we carefully consider it, examine it in all its details, it certainly initiates contracts for the transmission of the mails for a period of ten years and pledges the Government to the contracts thus made by the Postmaster-General. The amount appropriated by the amendment will perhaps be but the beginning of that to which we are pledged by the contracts, for this million dollars would be used for the coming fiscal year. The Postmaster-General by this provision is authorized to make contracts—

> For terms of ten years, for such transportation between such home and foreign ports as he may, in his discretion, designate in order best to promote the postal and commercial interests of the United States, in iron steamships wholly owned by American citizens and registered in American registry, such ships to be duly inspected under the direction of the Postmaster-General and Secretary of the Navy, and be equal in construction, accommodation, safety, and speed to the best vessels on the ocean carrying mails to the same ports, at a rate of compensation not exceeding $30 per mile one way for twelve round trips per annum.

He may contract for half a dozen lines for twelve round trips per annum at $30 per mile one way, and by those contracts thus entered into under this power the Government is pledged to all the money that is needed to carry them out. That is the whole of this proposition. The legislation that this amendment contemplates pledges the Government to ten years of this policy, and if it does not amount to general legislation under the provision of the twenty-ninth rule, there is no such thing as making use of words which can make general legislation. It covers the whole field, it embraces the whole scope of the proposition to carry mail for ten years at twelve trips per annum in steamships, and when the contracts are made you are bound to carry them out, and it involves an expenditure of I know not whether five million, or ten million, or fifty million dollars, but the discretion is a frightful one to give to any man. I trust the Senate will not give it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the point of order made against the reception of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] to the amendment reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The Chair submits the point of order to the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to understand the question now to be voted on. The Chair has ruled, as I understand, that this proposition is out of order. Are we voting on the ruling of the Chair, or is the Chair submitting to a vote of the Senate whether it is in order or not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair submitted that to the Senate; and the yeas and nays are ordered on the question, and those who are in favor of this amendment being in order will vote "yea;" those opposed, "nay."

Mr. BROWN. Then the question is not to sustain or overrule the decision of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no appeal taken from any decision of the Chair. The question was submitted early to the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. "Shall the amendment be admitted," is the question, "yea" or "nay."

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired upon the subsidy question with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who is called home by illness. I believe I ought to differ from him on the point of order, but it is differing from very high authority.

Mr. HOAR, (when Mr. BAYARD'S name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] I suppose he would vote against the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when his name was called.) On all questions relating to this bill I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) On all political questions and upon this question I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLAIR.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PUGH, (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Florida, was called.) The Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] is detained at home by the dangerous illness of his son, and is paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.]

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BRUCE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania.] If he were here I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL (after having voted in the negative.) Inadvertently I voted, having forgotten that I had at the instance of my good friend from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] Were the Senator from Kansas present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay." My vote is withdrawn.

Mr. BECK. On this and all other questions relating to the original amendment and all amendments thereto I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] who is now at home sick. I should vote "nay" if I could vote.

Mr. BAILEY. I am informed that a statement has been made to the effect that I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.] That is a mistake. An agreement of that kind was made, but the pair was transferred, I believe, to the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

Mr. BECK. I received a dispatch from the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] and that change of the pair was made.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not paired at all, and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 26; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment is decided to be out of order. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it:

When vessels built in other countries are so accepted and employed, the same shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges secured by law to vessels built in the United States of America, except the privilege of engaging in the coastwise trade.

I offer the amendment for the purpose of getting a more distinct expression than I think is contained in the amendment reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads as to the character of vessels in which the mails may be carried. I am in favor of opening to American capital the right to purchase vessels built anywhere of the description mentioned in the committee's amendment for the purpose of carrying into effect the appropriation of this million dollars; and as I do not understand that the amendment proposed by the committee very distinctly presents that view, although I believe the Senator who proposed the amendment believes that it does, I desire to have a more distinct expression on that point.

I do not propose to debate it at all. The question has been debated, on this side of the Chamber at least, by several Senators, especially by my colleague [Mr. PUGH] and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] so fully that I do not feel disposed to add anything to what has been said on that head, even if I had the ability to do so, which I do not pretend that I possess. I do not see that I could cast any new light on the proposition; but I will say that I think this is a fair compromise between those who are in favor of having the commerce of this country and its mails carried in American-built ships and those who are not. I am in favor of extending the postal convenience and service of this country upon the high seas, and in that respect I am inclined to extend the law now on the statute-book; and I think the postal service will be greatly facilitated if capitalists of this country are permitted to build ships in American ship-yards or to buy them elsewhere and offer them for this service.

I hope that gentlemen who differ with us in respect to the general policy of the repeal or modification of the navigation laws will find themselves willing on this occasion to meet us on the half-way ground and let us start this matter by an experiment which cannot do any harm, and may result in very great good. I think that all ships built abroad engaged by special contract in the service of the United States in the transportation of its mails ought to be entitled, in consideration of that fact, to an American register. They are on a footing with the vessels of the Navy and various other transports which are employed exclusively in the service of the United States in the transportation of its troops, munitions of war, and crossing upon the high seas. These ships, employed in the service of the United States under a special contract, should be required, it seems to me, to be put under no greater restriction in reference to all lawful privileges than a ship-of-war. Each of them is an agency of the Government of the United States in carrying on a constitutional operation, and I think we might as well require that a postal car that conveys the mail across this continent on the Union and Central Pacific Railways should be built in the United States and owned in the United States as to require that a ship chartered under a contract for carrying the mail between the ports of our country and ports of other countries should be built in the United States. The Government of the United States should have the opportunity of obtaining the facilities needed at the cheapest possible rate for carrying its mails to all parts of the world.

While I am in favor of giving every due protection to American industry where that protection is of any service to it, I think a fair opportunity is now presented to gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber to commence in this way an experiment which will be advantageous to the country.

Mr. WALLACE. I raise the point of order—I feel it my duty in regard to this bill—that this is general legislation of the most radical kind.

Mr. MORGAN. Not radical; it is democratic.

Mr. WALLACE. It repeals the navigation laws, so far as these steamships are concerned, and opens up a very large subject. It is very clearly obnoxious to the twenty-ninth rule, it seems to me, and I raise the point of order upon it.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of making any further argument on this question, as I had the privilege of making one on a former occasion. All I desire to say is that the amendment of my colleague is entirely acceptable to me. I suppose it will not be out of order for me to state my position in the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, from whom the original amendment came. I am willing to make this appropriation of a million dollars for carrying our mail across the ocean in iron ships owned exclusively by citizens of the United States, but I am not willing to make any further limitation. I am opposed to confining the appropriation to ships constructed in American ship-yards. I now repeat what I said on a former occasion, that all I am willing to do is to make an appropriation for ships owned exclusively by citizens of the United States wherever purchased, and let us try the experiment. I stated to the committee of which I am a member that I should vote to make the amendment reported from the committee plain upon that subject, and for that reason I favor the amendment of my colleague; and if the clause that this appropriation is for the benefit of American-built ships is not excluded from the amendment, I shall not be able to support it.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment proposed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional postal service to foreign countries, $1,000,000, to be expended under the direction of the Postmaster-General in the establishment of mail steamship lines equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican Gulf, and Pacific ports: Provided, That the vessels employed for such service shall be owned and manned by American citizens, and that said vessels thus employed shall be iron steamships, accepted by the Secretary of the Navy, after due inspection, as in all respects seaworthy and properly fitted to such service.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I am opposed to this amendment proposed by the Post-Office Committee. As a provision for the carrying of our mails to foreign countries, I do not think that it is necessary to appropriate this million of dollars. The Postmaster-General asks for no such appropriation of money to carry the mails to foreign countries. In his last report he speaks of our ocean mail service, and he does not ask, as I understand, any larger amount for the same than the $225,000 already appropriated by the bill as reported from the Committee on Appropriations. In his report at page 517 he gives the cost of ocean mail transportation for the year ended June 30, 1880, as $196,684.08.

Mr. MORGAN. I will ask the Senator from New York how that money is spent?

Mr. KERNAN. That which is appropriated by the bill is expended for carrying the mail on the system that now prevails to foreign countries.

Mr. MORGAN. Does not the law require the vessel which carries the mail to receive the postages?

Mr. KERNAN. I understand that; but have you heard any complaint from our commercial community anywhere that the present system does not give adequate mail facilities with foreign countries?

Mr. MORGAN. Now, if the honorable Senator will allow me, I do not so hear from anybody but the Postmaster-General; and even he requires more money for the purpose of transporting the foreign mails.

Mr. KERNAN. The appropriation is increased in the bill as reported by the Committee on Appropriations over last year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest that the question before the Senate is the point of order. By consent of the Senate the Senator from New York may proceed.

Mr. KERNAN. I rose to speak on the merits of the amendment proposed by the Post-Office Committee. This has been decided by the Senate to be in order; but if I am out of order at this time I will wait until that amendment comes up.

On page 517 of the volume containing the last annual report of the Postmaster-General I find this:

JOSEPH H. BLACKFAN,
Superintendent of Foreign Mails.

I remember very well that in 1878, when a provision like the amendment under consideration was before the Senate, the opinion of the Postmaster-General was called for and his letter was read, in which he said he did not ask for any such provision. Therefore I do not think as legislators we can justify ourselves in appropriating a million more money if we are looking only to the proper carrying of our mails to foreign countries. I believe this is done now to the satisfaction of the commercial community. There has been no petition, no resolutions from boards of trade, that I have heard of, asking us to appropriate more money for ocean mail service or saying that the service is not well performed by the present system of carrying the mails on the ocean.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] and other Senators have intimated that the real purpose of this amendment is to inaugurate a system by which our ship-building industry will be promoted and our ocean carrying trade restored by subsidies paid from the Treasury to the owners of American-built steamships. Do I not state it fairly? Is not this the real object? That is a great question, and one that I wish to have considered not as a part of an annual appropriation bill, but as a distinct measure, and when Congress has time to fully examine and discuss it, in the belief that there may be such legislation as will restore the ocean carrying trade which we have lost.

I shall be brief, for I realize the importance of time at this short session of Congress. As a measure to restore our foreign carrying trade I do not think this proposed amendment is in the right direction at all. The idea of building up our ocean carrying trade by taxing our people to pay subsidies to a few steamship lines is fallacious, in my judgment. This will never restore our lost carrying trade, nor will it materially increase our export trade. We have had some experience on this point, and we have had it within a few years past. I will briefly allude to it.

In 1864 a law was passed—a distinct law, not a rider to an appropriation bill—with a view to aid by this kind of legislation our carrying trade and our commerce with other countries. That law was in these words:

That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to unite with the general post-office department of the Empire of Brazil, or such officer of the government of Brazil as shall be authorized to act for that government, in establishing direct mail communication between the two countries by means of a monthly line of first-class American sea-going steamships, to be of not less than two thousand tons burden each, and of sufficient number to perform twelve round trips or voyages per annum between a port of the United States north of the Potomac River and Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil, touching at Saint Thomas, in the West Indies, at Bahia, Pernambuco, and such other intermediate port or ports as shall be considered necessary and expedient: Provided, That the expense of the service shall be divided between the two governments; and that the United States' portion thereof shall not exceed the sum of $150,000 for the performance of twelve round trips per annum, to be paid out of any money appropriated for the service of the Post-Office Department.

What was our experience under this law? The measure was adopted, doubtless honestly, by Congress, with the expectation of largely increasing our export trade with Brazil and other countries in South America, and not merely for the purpose of carrying the mails. A contract was made with the owners of American-built steamers by the Postmaster-General. There was but one party who had the required vessels to execute the contract, as I am informed, and he contracted that for ten years he would carry the mail as required by the statute for the price of $150,000 per year, to be paid by the Government of the United States. He performed the contract. How much did it aid us in creating a market for our products in Brazil, or how much did it aid us in increasing the carrying trade with foreign countries? I will state as briefly as I can the results of this experiment, made at an expense of one million and a half of dollars to the Treasury.

It will be found on examination that for the six years prior to 1865, when this contract took effect, our domestic exports to Brazil had averaged annually $5,713,000. That was what the exports averaged annually before we established this line of steamships running to that country. During the ten years of this subsidized line up to September, 1875, how much had our domestic exports to Brazil increased? That was the inducement that carried that bill. The purpose was to open a market for our products, to increase our domestic exports. During those ten years the average annual value of our domestic exports to Brazil was only $6,364,000. They increased only about half a million per year; and yet we were paying $150,000 per annum to have a line of steamships making a round trip every month between New York and Rio. Did this expenditure tend even to build up a permanent carrying trade by American-built ships between the United States and Brazil or other parts of South America? It did not. When the contract expired and the subsidy ceased, in 1875, the steamship line was discontinued. Not a vessel of that line made a single trip between New York and Rio after the subsidy ceased.

What further was the experience? for I was able to examine it a little further. It will be found that the subsidized line broke down other carrying lines that received no subsidy and that the freights were not made any cheaper. The line which had the subsidy broke down other lines, and freights were not reduced even while the subsidized line was in existence.

What happened after the subsidized steamers were withdrawn to which we had paid one million and half of dollars during the ten years? You will find that after that was withdrawn, and in 1876, there was established a line of iron steamers not American-built or owned by American citizens—I wish they could have been—which line ran between New York and Rio regularly each month. They were foreign-built steamers of a thousand tons burden each, run by agents residing in New York, but not under our flag, for they were not built in our country; and our laws would not permit our citizens to own them and sail them as American ships under our flag in transporting our own commerce. During the next two years this line of steamers carried our mails to and from Brazil for about one hundred dollars a month, and there was no complaint made that this mail service was not satisfactory. The export trade to Brazil increased during those two years to over seven million dollars annually. I am insisting that this subsidized line did not increase our export trade and did not materially tend to restore our carrying trade to American merchants or American vessels.

In 1878, when I asked the Senate to hear me briefly on this subject, I had all the papers before me showing the exact figures. I will read from what I then said a paragraph:

That line stopped in September, 1875. What has been our experience since we have ceased to pay the subsidy? Has our export trade diminished? The average annual value was $6,300,000 while the line ran. I find from statistics that since that line stopped and during the past two years our export of domestic products to Brazil have been of the average annual value of $7,463,596, having increased about a million a year under the natural laws of trade more than with the subsidy.

In the chief mercantile city of the Union I have inquired of merchants and business men whose opinions have great weight with me, and they expressed themselves against the idea that we can build up our American mercantile marine or our export trade to foreign countries or our ocean carrying trade by subsidizing a few lines of ocean steamers. The effect of such subsidized lines is to break down other lines and to discourage private enterprise, and the moment you cease to pay subsidies the lines receiving them stop and we have no American vessels, either sail or steam, engaged in the foreign carrying trade. That is the result of our experience, and I submit to Senators that we must adopt some other measure than drawing from the tax-payers money to subsidize a few lines of steamships to run on the ocean to build up our mercantile marine and restore to our own citizens the carrying trade. It will not succeed. You will have a few lines, there will be great complaint and jealousy that there is favoritism, and you will bring about our Federal Legislature an atmosphere that none of us wish to have surround it. The pressure for these special contracts or subsidies comes from owners of particular lines of steamships. As far as I know no petition from the people has come to us for this kind of legislation. There are no boards of trade recommending it. This amendment, if adopted, places a million of dollars in the hands of the Postmaster-General that he, in his discretion, may establish mail steamship lines among our different ports; it is all left to his discretion.

But I am not now criticising the mere language of the amendment, I am insisting that we cannot build up our carrying trade by subsidies to a few steamship lines.

I submit that this is not the remedy, it is not a move in the right direction to build up our ocean mercantile marine or our carrying trade upon the seas. It is, in the language of a Senator, [Mr. HAMLIN,] "an entering-wedge" to appropriate next year a larger sum, and the next year a still larger sum for these subsidies; and soon you will have no one running steamships except those who get a subsidy from the Treasury. The subsidized lines can easily combine and drive from the ocean competing lines not subsidized, and when the subsidy ceases we will be without any American vessels in the ocean carrying trade. There were complaints in 1878, when this question of subsidizing was before us, by the owners of ships in Baltimore that the prior subsidized line to Brazil had been detrimental to the carrying trade they were carrying on to and from Brazil in their sailing-ships; that it had driven them out of this trade, and when they were driven out of the trade, during eight or ten years, the subsidized line stopped when it could get no more money from the Treasury.

I object to the measure as an entering-wedge to open the Treasury for millions of the people's money to flow out of it into the pockets of a few persons without any substantial benefit to the mass of the people. I am as much in favor as any one can be of trying to regain our carrying trade by legislation, matured with care and the advice of the best-informed men of the country. I venture to say that on a full examination of this subject, so important to our country, we will be satisfied that the granting of large subsidies to a few ocean steamship lines for carrying our foreign mails will not prove efficacious in restoring to our merchants our proper share of the ocean carrying trade in American-built ships. Some other measure than subsidies to a few steamship owners is necessary to re-establish our mercantile marine upon the ocean.

In my judgment our navigation laws should be revised and materially changed. We have had navigation laws in force, which are claimed to be for the protection of American ship-builders and for the protection of American laborers, until we have ruined our ship-building business for the foreign ocean carrying trade. Let me give some statistics on that point. I take them from a table in the annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics on the foreign commerce of the United States for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1880. Table F, on page 61 of this report, is headed "Nationality of the tonnage entered at sea-ports of the United States from foreign countries from 1856 to 1880, inclusive." In this table the total tonnage entered at our ports for each year, and also the portion of it which was American and the portion of it which was foreign, is given. For the year ended June 30, 1856, the total tonnage entered at ports of the United States from foreign countries was 4,464,038 tons, of which the American-built ships constituted 3,194,275 tons, and the foreign-built ships only 1,259,762 tons. How was it during the year ending June 30, 1880? For the year ending June 30, 1880, the total tonnage from foreign countries entered at American sea-ports was 15,240,534 tons. How much of this was American-built ships? Only 3,128,374 tons, being 65,901 tons less than it was for the year ending June 30, 1856. We have been by our navigation laws protecting, as is claimed, American ship-building and the American foreign carrying trade during all these years; and yet our American-built ships engaged in the foreign trade, which in 1856 constituted three-fourths of all the tonnage entered at our ports from foreign countries, in 1880 constituted only about one-fifth of all the tonnage entered at our ports from foreign countries. In 1880 the foreign tonnage was 12,112,160, the American only 3,128,374. From 1856 to 1880 the tonnage entered at our ports from foreign countries had increased from 1,269,763 to 12,112,160 tons, and the American had decreased to 3,128,374 tons.

Now, let us see how the merchant marine of other countries has increased while ours has decreased. On page 43 of his report the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics speaks of the decline of our foreign carrying trade, while that of other countries has increased. He says:

> The decadence of that branch of American shipping which is employed in our foreign trade is more clearly indicated, however, by the statistics of the movement of tonnage hereinbefore presented. The table showing the nationality of tonnage entered indicates that since the year 1856 there has been an increase in the tonnage entered at American sea-ports of vessels of every nationality except those carrying the American flag. American tonnage alone has exhibited a decline. The increase in British tonnage entered amounted to 6,967,173 tons; the increase in German tonnage amounted to 922,903 tons; the increase in Swedish and Norwegian tonnage amounted to 1,214,098 tons; the increase in Italian tonnage amounted to 596,907 tons; the increase in French tonnage amounted to 208,412 tons; the increase in Spanish tonnage amounted to 164,683 tons; the increase in Austrian tonnage amounted to 204,872 tons; the increase in Belgian tonnage amounted to 226,277 tons; the increase in Russian tonnage amounted to 104,009 tons, whereas there was a decrease in the American tonnage entered of 65,901 tons.

And is it true that it can be materially increased and built up by a system of subsidies granted to a few ship-owners from year to year? I want to call attention to the value of the exports and imports of this country from 1856 down to this time. By whose ships have they been carried? That will be found in this report, Table G, at page 62, in detail; and the percentage of our total exports and imports for each year from 1856 to 1880 carried in American-built vessels is there stated.

In the year ending June 30, 1856, the value of the total exports and imports from this to other countries, and from foreign countries to us, amounted to $641,604,850. What portion was carried in foreign vessels, and what portion in American vessels, built in America, owned by Americans, commanded by American officers, and manned by American sailors? American vessels carried $482,268,274 in value of this total of exports and imports in 1856. In foreign vessels there were carried only $159,336,576 in value. How is it to-day? For the year ending June 30, 1880, the value of our total exports and imports to and from foreign countries amounted to $1,613,770,633. Of this there was carried in foreign vessels in value $1,309,466,596; in American ships in value only $280,005,497. In 1856 the amount of our total exports and imports was $641,604,850, and of this amount there was carried in American vessels $482,268,274 in value. Now we carry in American ships only $280,005,497 of a total value of $1,613,770,633 of our exports and imports.

The following, taken from Table G above referred to, shows the total value of the exports and imports of the United States in each year, and the percentage of the same carried in American-built ships:

| Fiscal years. | Total imports and exports. | Percentage carried in American vessels. |
|---|---|---|
| 1856 | $641,604,850 | 75.2 |
| 1857 | 723,850,823 | 70.5 |
| 1858 | 607,857,571 | 73.7 |
| 1859 | 695,552,592 | 66.9 |
| 1860 | 762,288,550 | 66.5 |
| 1861 | 584,995,066 | 65.2 |
| 1862 | 435,710,714 | 50.0 |
| 1863 | 584,928,502 | 41.4 |
| 1864 | 669,855,034 | 27.5 |
| 1865 | 604,412,996 | 27.7 |
| 1866 | 1,010,938,552 | 32.2 |
| 1867 | 877,020,391 | 33.9 |
| 1868 | 848,527,647 | 35.1 |
| 1869 | 876,449,384 | 33.1 |
| 1870 | 991,896,979 | 35.6 |
| 1871 | 1,132,472,098 | 31.2 |
| 1872 | 1,212,398,233 | 28.5 |
| 1873 | 1,340,902,221 | 25.8 |
| 1874 | 1,312,680,640 | 26.7 |
| 1875 | 1,219,434,544 | 25.8 |
| 1876 | 1,242,904,312 | 33.1 |
| 1877 | 1,194,045,627 | 26.5 |
| 1878 | 1,210,519,399 | 25.9 |
| 1879 | 1,202,708,614 | 22.6 |

This same report, on page 42, says:

> The building of ships and barks employed in our foreign commerce fell from an annual average of two hundred and thirty-three during the ten years from 1851 to 1860 to an annual average of fifty-six during the ten years from 1871 to 1880. There were only twenty-three ships and barks built (for foreign commerce) during the year ending June 30, 1880.

We were building from 1851 to 1860 two hundred and thirty-three ships and barks annually for our foreign carrying trade. For the ten years from 1871 to 1880 we built only an annual average of fifty-six vessels; and during the year ending June 30, 1880, we built only twenty-three ships and barks for the ocean carrying trade. The Chief of the Bureau says in his report, pages 42, 43:

> The iron steamship is now the controlling vehicle of commerce on the ocean.
> The tonnage of iron vessels built in this country during the last five years amounted to only 101,823 tons, almost entirely for our coastwise or home trade, in which no foreign competition is allowed under the provisions of our navigation laws, whereas the iron ship building of Great Britain during the last five years reported amounted to 1,800,193 tons.

These facts prove clearly that under our present policy and laws we cannot successfully compete with foreign countries in building ships for the ocean carrying trade, nor are our citizens able to engage successfully in the ocean carrying trade. Our ship-building industry, so far as ships for the foreign carrying trade is concerned, amounts to nothing; and our own citizens are really excluded from engaging in the carrying trade between our own and foreign countries.

There should be a remedy for this; I believe there is; but I do not believe the granting of subsidies by the Government to the owners of a few lines of steamers will prove to be a remedy.

In my judgment the remedy is to change our policy and laws as to ship-builders and ship-owners; relieve both from restrictions and burdens which prevent them from competing successfully with the ship-builders and ship-owners of other countries.

In addition to the exclusive right to build vessels for our coastwise and inland trade which our ship-builders now enjoy, let our laws be changed so that they shall have free from import duty or tax everything which they use in building, equipping, or repairing ships for use by American citizens in the foreign carrying trade. Then if they cannot furnish us ships for the ocean carrying trade at as low prices as they can be bought of foreign build, they cannot complain if our citizens are allowed to buy ships built in foreign countries and employ them as American ships in the carrying trade with foreign countries.

We should revise and change our navigation laws so that our citizens shall be permitted to buy ships wherever and from whomsoever they can buy them cheapest, and obtain for such ships an American registry and employ them under American officers as American ships in the foreign carrying trade no matter where they were built. Our citizens certainly should be allowed to have as cheap vessels to transport our exports and imports as foreigners. If not, they cannot compete successfully with foreigners in the carrying trade.

Permit vessels owned by American citizens and engaged in the foreign trade to take their stores out of bond duty free; and change our consular system and laws so that American vessels shall not be subject in foreign ports to any consul fees or charges, or if to any, not in excess of those paid by British ships.

Adopt for American vessels a new tonnage measurement based on actual carrying capacity and excluding the space occupied by engines and boilers and for the accommodation of officers and crew, and thus place American ships on an equality with foreign ships as to tonnage dues.

Abolish compulsory pilotage in the United States. Modify our laws as to seamen so that the owners of American ships shall not be burdened and annoyed by needless restrictions. So far as it can be done exempt from taxation all vessels employed in the foreign carrying trade. In a word, we should relieve American owners and ships employed in the foreign carrying trade from all restrictions and burdens which place them at a disadvantage in competing with foreign ships and owners. Legislation of this character will aid our ship-builders and will enable our citizens to become again carriers on the ocean.

Mr. President, I have indicated why I oppose this subsidy system. It will not, in my judgment, materially aid in restoring the carrying trade in American ships owned by American citizens. It will not enable the American ship-builders to compete successfully in building ships for the American foreign carrying trade, for they cannot do so now. Twenty-three ships and barks only were built during the last year for foreign commerce. I am opposed to this amendment proposed by the Committee on Post-Offices because I think it means nothing but a system of subsidies to a few owners of steamships. This will not remedy the difficulties under which American ship-builders labor or restore our mercantile marine. I think Congress should turn its attention to revising and changing our navigation laws so as to relieve our citizens from restrictions and burdens which have driven them out of the foreign carrying trade. If this is done we shall soon begin to carry a large portion of our exports and imports in American ships owned by American citizens and navigated by American officers and sailors.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6719) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator who has charge of the Army bill, the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS,] is not in his seat, and I move in his absence that the Senate insist on its amendments and ask a committee of conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

THOMAS WORTHINGTON.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to have the Senate consider one of the bills that came over from the House, a bill granting a pension of $30 a month to Thomas Worthington. It passed the House unanimously and I do not think there will be the least objection to granting to that poor old soldier who performed such meritorious service for his country this little pittance to keep him from absolute poverty. I ask unanimous consent to have the bill acted on at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the order by which the bill was referred to the Committee on Pensions will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (H. R. No. 6201) granting a pension to Thomas Worthington was considered, as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

Mr. HAMLIN. With the consent of the Senator from Texas, who is entitled to the floor, I want to make a correction, or rather to add a word or two to what I said in reply to an interrogatory put to me this morning by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] I had in my mind the idea that the amount of one million appropriated would furnish us with only a very small proportion of the mail facilities to foreign countries that are desirable. As I now understand, he put to me the question whether the $30 per mile was not too much for each trip. I did not catch the precise scope of his question at the moment. The $30 is for the twelve trips per annum, not for one trip; but if a contract were made for twelve trips a year this rate was to be only on the nautical mile of the route one way for the whole twelve trips, and the amendment which I offered so read.

Mr. MORRILL. In reading the amendment I thought the language was ambiguous at least, and probably open to the interpretation which I gave it.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from Alabama offers an amendment to the amendment reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. To that the Senator from Pennsylvania interposes a point of order, on the ground that it is, as he terms it, radical legislation. The question, then, and the only question before the Senate at this time, is, is the amendment of the Senator from Alabama in order?

I call the attention of the Senate to the text of the amendment which is proposed to be amended by the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Provided, That the vessels employed for such service shall be owned and manned by American citizens, &c.

The expression is "owned and manned," not "built." That has been decided by the Senate to be in order. Now, the purpose, and the only purpose, of this amendment of the Senator from Alabama is to make clear and plain the right of vessels thus employed, owned, and manned by American citizens to be registered as American vessels.

But it is insisted by the Senator from Pennsylvania that that is a repeal of the navigation laws. I submit that it is not so, nor does it touch the navigation laws in any regard except in so far as Congress has the right to do it. The Constitution grants to Congress the power to establish post-offices and post-roads, and there goes necessarily with that grant the power to do anything to effect or accomplish the object of the grant. Hence if Congress sees proper to except out of the operation of the navigation laws vessels employed by virtue of an act of Congress in the carrying of the mail, Congress has a perfect right to except those vessels thus employed out of the operation of the navigation laws without in the slightest degree affecting the navigation laws themselves.

That is what this says; not that the navigation laws shall be repealed, but that vessels which are employed by the Government in the carrying of the mail shall be owned and manned by American citizens; and the amendment offered by the Post-Office Committee, and which is proposed to be amended by the Senator from Alabama, applies alone to vessels employed by the Government in the execution of a constitutional duty and without the slightest interference with the navigation laws as I consider. Therefore I think that it is in order. Besides, it simply perfects the text of that which the Senate has decided to be not in contravention of the twenty-ninth rule.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I wish I could vote conscientiously for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama, but I have an unfortunate propensity for being consistent in my votes, and having objected yesterday to this original amendment as changing existing law and therefore liable to objection under the twenty-ninth rule, I feel compelled to vote against this amendment upon the same ground.

It strikes me that it is a repeal pro tanto of the navigation acts. I should like to see them repealed. I think the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is the best thing that has been presented to the consideration of the Senate since this Post-Office appropriation bill has been up, and if it were a substantive proposition I should vote for it with cheerful alacrity. I cannot vote for it now because I do not think it is in order, and therefore I shall vote to sustain the theory that it is out of order.

But see what it would accomplish if it were only in order. It would destroy the hope, and the view, and the anxiety of that distinguished public benefactor, Mr. John Roach. It would be distressing to his sensibilities if such an amendment as this should be tacked onto an amendment which in reality, however intended, is to redound entirely and exclusively for his benefit. Mr. Roach does not want "free ships;" he wants American-built ships to be engaged in this traffic. Why? Because Mr. Roach is the only man who has got the American-built ships to comply with this requirement and this demand. Mr. Roach comes here and says that anybody that opposes him—so I read from his testimony before the Committee on Finance—is a selfish man; and he described me, (I do not object to it,) because I opposed his subsidy two years ago, as a currier, a leather-man, in some anecdote which he detailed to the Committee on Finance, because I was in favor of building the ruined town in leather, being a currier, and that I did not want anybody but myself and my own town to succeed. Mr. Roach must have been cutting my cloth according to his own measure. He is selfish, and wants no free ships; he wants only ships of his own build to be used in this carrying trade. If you adopted this proposition look how distressed he would be. In this testimony he says:

> I have here a paper that appears in the hands of nearly every shipping man of New York once a month or once in three months. (H. E. Moss & Co.'s Ocean Steamship Circular,) and in this list here published are four hundred and six iron ships of all ages and of all tonnage, tied to the docks of Liverpool, Glasgow, and other places, for sale.

No wonder he is horrified at a proposition for free ships. No wonder he dreads our opening wide the doors to American capitalists to go abroad and do as Germany has done and as other nations have done that have increased their tonnage upon the ocean and buy ships where they can buy them cheapest. No wonder he is horrified at our ability to go to Glasgow and other ports in Great Britain and buy some of these four hundred and six iron ships and bring them over here to run in competition with him for a subsidy.

> Here is over forty million dollars' worth of property for sale at a low valuation.

Can any comment stronger than that be made upon our navigation laws, against which the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] so well inveighed the other day, that here is forty million dollars' worth of property in steamships lying tied to the docks of British ports open for sale to American citizens and we are not able to go out and buy them and run them in the American ocean service? What a commentary it is upon our shortsightedness! We are asked to imitate England in regard to subsidizing vessels, and yet we turn our backs upon what England did in former years. To build up her tonnage, to increase her ship-sailing facilities, she came to America and bought our Baltimore clippers and other sailing-vessels in those days when we outstripped the world in the way of fast-sailing ships. England did that. England permitted its people to come here and buy these ships as cheaply as they could buy them and take them back to British ports to sail under the British flag; but we in our wisdom will not permit our citizens to do any such thing.

I wish I could vote for this amendment; but I cannot vote for it under my view of the rules of the Senate. Therefore I only desire to explain that while I favor this proposition, one of the very best, in my judgment, which has been proposed—while I approve of it entirely, under my views it is impossible for me to give it my support upon this occasion.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to ask him if he would not support this amendment if the Senate should hold that it is in order?

Mr. WHYTE. I would not; because I do not think a majority of the Senate ought to control my judgment.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, the merits of the proposition before the Senate have so far been discussed upon questions of order, first, as to the amendment reported by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] representing the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and now upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.] I voted to sustain the Chair in deciding that the amendment first offered was not in order. I voted more upon the ground that I did not favor the proposition than upon the abstract question of order. Since I have been in the Senate I have found that upon this class of questions Senators have usually voted that that was in order which they were in favor of, and that that was not in order which they were opposed to. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama were addressed to a proposition which I favored, it would certainly meet my favor. If the proposition submitted by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads through their chairman to add $1,000,000 to the Post-Office appropriation bill, to authorize the Postmaster-General to establish ocean mail lines, was one which I felt ought to be adopted at this time, I should certainly desire that it should be adopted with the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, made perhaps a little clearer in its terms than that amendment now stands.

This discussion has run into the question of how our commercial marine has gone down to its present point and how it may be re-established. It is a lamentable fact that of our foreign commerce but little in proportion is carried by American vessels; that while twenty years ago three-fourths of it was carried in American vessels, but 17 per cent. of it is so carried now. The statistics show the additional fact, not very encouraging to us, that if a disturbance should take place in Europe between two of the commercial nations of that hemisphere, by which their commercial marine might become locked up by the dangers of war, almost our entire surplus would remain upon our hands; that of the eight hundred and odd million dollars of our exports, as shown by the reports for the last current year, we should have the capacity to carry but 17 per cent., and should have to find some means of obtaining a shipment of the remainder until we could create the power within ourselves, or we should have to keep it on hand.

Many speculations as to the cause of this decadence of American shipping have been indulged in, and I do not think the statistics give any very clear exposition of it. That it could be remedied to some extent by a change in our policy in reference to the licensing and registration of vessels, I have no doubt. At one time it was supposed by our Government that it had greatly injured us during the late civil war for our commercial marine to be compelled in a great measure to take down the American flag and to take protection under foreign governments. That was certainly at one time regarded as a very great injury to us. It will be found in what is called the American case, in connection with the proceeding of the Geneva tribunal, that it was made one of the substantive grounds of complaint under which we sought to recover damages from Great Britain, that our vessels had been thus compelled to abandon the protection of our own flag and take protection under foreign governments.

While contemplating that fact, when we look into our statute-books we find that at the close of the war, in 1866, just after this great damage and wrong had been suffered in the revision of our navigation laws, a distinct and substantive section was inserted by which those vessels that had thus, for the time being, denationalized themselves were declared expatriated and prohibited from ever again returning; and that was put alongside of other legislation by which the right of registration and license was limited not merely to vessels owned by American citizens but to American-built vessels. These two facts do not go very well side by side, and yet they are prominent facts in connection with this branch of our industrial interests.

Mr. President, I am of those who do not believe that the remedy is to come by the class legislation that is proposed in the amendment submitted by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. In the first place, a million dollars is here to be placed at the discretion of the Postmaster-General for the establishment of marine lines for the transportation of our mails. This, it is stated in the amendment, is to be equitably distributed between the ports of the Atlantic, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Pacific; but every dollar may be expended in six months or a year, or in any other period that in the discretion of the Postmaster-General he may see proper to expend it. He is not required to enter into contracts for any determinate period of time. He is simply vested with authority to expend $1,000,000 in an experiment to establish ocean mail lines from the different ports of the United States, which he may select under the very general limitation contained in this act.

I am perfectly willing to provide for carrying our mails to foreign countries, and to provide liberally for it. I am also willing that in selecting the modes of conveyance there shall be discrimination in favor of our own citizens; but I am not willing that this Government shall pay any portion of the freight bills of those who may ship produce from our country to foreign countries. If subsidies are to be resorted to I would rather go at once to the freighter than to the ship-owner, and give any direct subsidy to those who might ship to foreign countries with which our trade at present is limited, by way of building it up, and subsidize upon the amount of their shipments or give drawbacks upon the amount of the freights that they have to pay. I would prefer to go to that directly rather than to undertake to subsidize lines of transportation.

The objection that has been stated to this proposition it seems to me is unanswerable. Whenever you subsidize a line between any port in the United States and a foreign port, you necessarily limit the amount that is to be transported between those ports to the capacity of that line and exclude competition from it. The subsidized line has the advantage. It has the patronage of the Government, the countenance and support of the Government, and the Government money. The statistics read by the Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] in reference to the experiment made some years ago in regard to the trade and commerce between the ports of New York and Rio de Janeiro are but a simple illustration of that fact. A subsidized line of limited capacity carried a certain amount of freight for ten years, and when the subsidy ended the line ended, and as a matter of course until volunteers came in, until others came forward to engage in the trade upon their own account, the intercourse in the shape of commerce almost ceased between those points. But during all that time the stream did not rise above the fountain, and could not rise above it from the very nature of the transaction in which the Government was thus engaged.

If this experiment is to be tried, if this million dollars is to be thus put at the option of the Postmaster-General, I certainly hope and trust that all limitation and restriction in regard to the selection of vessels, so that they shall be owned by citizens of the United States, will be taken off, and that not merely one establishment in this country, but the constructors of vessels of this class everywhere may have the opportunity to sell them to American citizens to be used in this experiment. But I shall be compelled to vote against the entire experiment, because I do not believe it is the proper mode of restoring our lost condition upon the ocean, or of remedying the evils under which we are now suffering in that regard.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I will confine myself entirely to the amendment offered by my friend from Alabama, and I would not say a word except for the fact that I shall be compelled to vote against that amendment while the principles involved in it meet my entire approbation. Three or four years ago on this floor I announced my desire to vote for measures changing our navigation laws; further than that, even to abrogate treaties if necessary in order to give a rebate to American bottoms. I have not changed my opinion upon that subject. In my judgment, it is the only way that we can bring back to us the commerce which we have lost. But we cannot do it by an amendment of this character, which, in my judgment, is plainly out of order. Therefore, while seemingly I should vote for an amendment of this character, I shall be compelled to vote against it because I believe it to be entirely out of order. While I would be very glad to join with my friend from Alabama in the passage of any measure which would give to American citizens the right to buy ships wherever they may choose to buy them, I would discriminate in favor of American bottoms after the ships become American bottoms, and in that way rebuild, if possible, our commerce.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I concur in what has been expressed so briefly by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON.] The principle that is embodied in the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] meets with my approbation. I would give to an American citizen the right to buy a ship wherever he may find it to his interest to make the purchase, and bringing it to this country make it an American ship; for unless we do away with the navigation laws of the United States which exclude vessels of foreign origin from the benefits and advantages pertaining to ownership by an American citizen, I have no hope of seeing American citizens enjoying the advantages of the carrying trade of the products of our country.

The destruction of this carrying trade is to my mind one of the most remarkable facts that we have witnessed in this remarkable age. Twenty-four years ago there belonged to American citizens almost altogether the carrying of American products and the bringing to this country the articles that our people bought abroad. The ratio carried by American vessels has diminished, as has been stated this afternoon, from 75 per cent. of the entire foreign trade of the country to 17 per cent., while in every other department of industry we have grown in a manner that is almost miraculous. While our population in twenty-four years has increased almost or quite a hundred fold, while our territory has been enlarged—I mean that which is brought under the hand and control of man—while our domestic productions of every kind have increased from one hundred to five hundred fold, we find the remarkable fact that the carrying trade of American citizens has been diminished in the ratio I have mentioned.

There is a cause for this, and I do not think that it has been fully stated here. I do not propose to go into the discussion, however, because the measures that are necessary, in my opinion, to correct the evil are not to-day before the Senate; but there is a variety of causes. First, we have protected the ship-building interests out of existence; we have forbidden American citizens to buy any other than American-built vessels to engage in the foreign trade, and the building of vessels has diminished from an average of two hundred and fifty per year to twenty-three per year. Protection has strangled this industry. That is one of the causes, and why has it so operated? People engage in buying ships and in operating them for the purpose of making a profit; and if they are compelled to buy ships at an advanced price; if, in other words, they are compelled to pay more than others are compelled to pay, they cannot enter into free competition with the other people who buy them cheaper than they. So I regard it as indispensable if we are to enter upon legislation looking to a correction of this evil, that we should abolish our navigation laws.

But that is not, in my opinion, the only cause of the decadence of American shipping. In the past twenty years we have been afflicted in this country with what is called so familiarly here the war of the rebellion. There was an immense waste of capital and of wealth in the North and in the South. There was an accumulation of debt, which is resting still upon the country. There was an enlargement of the pension-roll, which requires to-day forty or fifty million dollars annually, the interest upon our debt being seventy or seventy-five million dollars annually. For the ten years past it has averaged $100,000,000 annually, and is now not less than seventy-five or eighty million dollars. All this waste we have had to supply.

More than that, in the years that have rolled by since 1865 the Government has endeavored to build up the manufacturing interests of the country and every inducement and every persuasion that Government could offer has been offered to the capitalists of the country to invest their money in manufactures. Our manufacturing interest has increased greatly beyond anything that had been before known in the history of this country. More than that, we have invited immigrants to come here from abroad. We have built great lines of railroad penetrating the wilds of the West and opening up to the use of our people and of those who come from abroad the vast territories that lie beyond the Mississippi River. Homesteads have been given to the people. Bounties have been given by the Government to corporations to enable them to build railroads to penetrate into the western country and to carry there all the arts of civilization. The capital, the enterprise, the energies of our people have thus been engaged in opening up the great West and giving to the country, I may say, and to the world, the magnificent productions of the soil of the West, and thus our foreign trade has been increased. From this cause and from this source there has been brought about that remarkable change in our foreign exchanges enabling us to resume specie payments and bring into the country one, two, or three hundred millions a year in the shape of gold, the value of our products exported over the value of the products that we have brought from abroad.

I say the wealth of the country, the enterprise of our people, the energies of our people have been in a different direction, and we to-day, in consequence of the well-directed efforts of the citizens of the United States, are the most prosperous people on the face of the globe. No other people are fed and clad and enjoy the comforts that the American people enjoy. Great Britain has a large commerce; so has Germany; so has Spain; so has every European power; but still do the subjects of those governments enjoy the comforts accorded or that, I might almost say, belong to every American citizen? Not at all. We are a rich people, and we are growing richer every day, North, South, East, and West. There is an improvement and an advance in wealth. Can we expect, does any reasonable man expect, that we can surpass all the peoples of the world in every department of industry? Have we any reason to expect that we shall surpass our English friends, or our German friends, or the French, a people who have a civilization equal to our own, a people who are advanced in the arts, a people who are our equal in respect to the sciences and in everything that civilization can bring? I certainly do not expect it.

I have no doubt there will be disappointments whatever measure we may adopt in the Congress of the United States to restore the carrying trade to American citizens. There will be disappointments, because I do not think that we have taken a broad enough view of this whole subject. I should vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to the amendment that comes from the Post-Office Committee if it were broad enough, if it would at once abolish the navigation laws of the United States, with a view to make an experiment, not believing that in one year, or in five years, or in ten years, or indeed in twenty years, we can recover our lost carrying trade, but with a view to make the effort and to diversify the industries of our people, to take away some part of their capital which is now invested in manufactures, some part of their enterprise and their energy that is now directed to the development of the country that is west of us, and save something for the children and grandchildren of those who are living to-day, for I believe that we are settling up our great domain much too rapidly. I believe the American people are making a mistake in encouraging to come from abroad 300,000, or 500,000, or 1,000,000, as they would be welcome should they come, to settle up our vacant territories. We are saving nothing for those who come after us. We have a population to-day in the United States sufficient for every purpose that we should desire. We have enough to make us one of the strongest governments upon earth. We have enough to give us an internal commerce the most magnificent that the world has ever seen. We have population enough and territory enough already opened up to the industries of our people to make us, as I said a while ago, the richest people in all the comforts that can accompany civilization upon the globe. I think in that we are making a mistake. I would wish to diversify still further our industries. I should like to see a part of that capital, I should like to see some of that enterprise and some of the great energies of the American people turned in the direction that is now desired.

But I cannot vote for the amendment, because it means nothing. It seems to me, I say so respectfully, that it is nothing more than empiricism. It undertakes, by establishing three or four lines of steamers and putting upon the ocean ten or twelve ships, to restore that lost carrying trade, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, to bring it up to 50, 60, or 75 per cent. of the entire foreign commerce of the country, and place it where it was twenty-five years ago. That reminds me very much of the story that is told of Mrs. Partington, who undertook with her broom to sweep back the rolling billows of the ocean that were threatening to overwhelm her. You can do nothing in that way. It is a mere drop in the bucket; it will amount to nothing. Your million of dollars thus expended will pay you, what? As has been said by other Senators here to-day, it will but build up a few capitalists at the expense of those who are competing with them. You establish a line of these steamers from New York to Rio Janeiro, and what will be the effect upon the commerce of Baltimore? I remember a few years ago thirty or forty sailing-vessels, not steam-vessels, where sailors were trained, were employed in the Baltimore and Rio trade. What was the effect of the bounties that were paid by the Government to a line of steamers? It was almost to destroy the interests connected with that shipping. That will be the effect and the only effect of it. I think that the remedy must be more radical; you must go to the very root of this thing.

I agree with what the Senator from Connecticut has said, that if you expect to restore the ocean carrying trade by legislation you must abolish your navigation laws, and you must extend to all the American people (not to a few, not to the builder of an iron vessel upon the Delaware, excluding everybody else) the advantages that are to be derived from legislation, and you must have freedom of competition. In other words, let there be a rebate of duties on all dutiable articles brought into this country in American bottoms. I do not know what rate per cent. would be required, but if I to-day were voting for any subsidy system my mind would take that direction and make it free and equal to everybody. I cannot vote for this amendment.

Mr. President, I beg pardon of the Senate for detaining it as long as I have. I intended when I rose to say only one word.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I think it would be entirely fair, as the mover of this amendment——

Mr. CONKLING. As it is Saturday afternoon and well-nigh five o'clock, I ask the Senator from Alabama whether he will yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. MORGAN. I will in a very few moments, I will say to the Senator from New York.

It would be entirely fair, I was about to remark, as the mover of this proposition, that I should be allowed some latitude upon the merits of this proposition, which have been brought into this debate very much contrary to the views of the Senate under the fortieth rule, because as I understand it the Chair has not yet decided, but Senators have taken the liberty to express a very wide and reverential loyalty to the rules of the Senate. I prize that, particularly as our precedents, as was shown by the Senator from Kansas this morning, are revolutionized whenever the judgment of the Senate changes upon a particular proposition, especially under the rules relating to the bringing in of amendments to appropriation bills. You can find almost any kind of decision by the Senate upon those rules you choose to look for. The fact is that the Senate in ruling matters in order or out of order upon appropriation bills under the two rules which have been quoted here is frequently moved, as has been confessed by Senators on the floor this afternoon, by the consideration that it bestows upon the amendment itself and not upon the question of order that is involved in it. Whenever the Senate has seen proper to introduce a subject into an appropriation bill, it has always found a reason for doing so; and in truth no one decision made by the Senate is a precedent for another unless the cases are precisely alike.

The case that is now presented is not like any that has heretofore been presented. I desire to state to the Senate substantially the grounds upon which I think this amendment is in order, and then I shall have said on this subject all I desire to say at this time.

On page 8, line 184, under the head of "Office of Superintendent of Foreign Mails," the Committee on Appropriations, following what the House had done, appropriated "for transportation of foreign mails, $225,000," without saying anything as to how they shall be transported, or in what kind of ships. When we turn to the statutes on that subject we find that the Postmaster-General has a right to contract with ships built in America, or to contract with ships built abroad, for the expenditure of that sum of money; so that we have both classes already in the provisions of the law; and the money is appropriated out of the Treasury to pay the expenses of transporting foreign mails to be carried in American-built ships or in foreign-built ships, as the Postmaster-General may see proper. This amendment adds to that sum $1,000,000, and that is the whole effect of it; so that the appropriation stands on the statutes at $1,225,000 for carrying foreign mails, with this addition:

For additional postal service to foreign countries, $1,000,000, to be expended, &c.

The additional postal service is not provided for under the laws of the United States in reference to the manner in which it shall be expended. Therefore it is proper when we vote the money for that additional service that we should indicate the channels through which that money is to be used; and inasmuch as the existing laws authorize the Postmaster-General to contract with foreign-built ships and also with American-built ships for the transportation of these mails, there can be no violation of the rules of the Senate and no repeal of the statutes by saying to what particular classes of ships this particular appropriation of a million dollars shall be applied. Nor can there be any violation of law or repeal or alteration of law by saying that the vessels which are employed, as the Senator from Texas so well remarked, to carry these mails back and forth, shall be entitled to the privileges of American-built ships; that is, to wear our flag and to have an American register while they are engaged in the service, not permanently, but while they are thus employed.

It would be a strange thing if the Postmaster-General under existing laws can employ foreign-built ships to carry the mails of the United States, and if the Senate of the United States in increasing the appropriation has no right to say that those vessels shall be accepted in this country for registration as if they had been built in this country. Senators talk about consistency as if they felt that they were really very consistent; but there is no consistency in action of this kind.

Some remarks have been made about the doctrine of subsidy contained in this amendment. If you leave it to stand where it is as offered by the committee, Senators claim that it is a subsidy. If you put my amendment upon it, then you say it is not quite so much of a subsidy, but yet some argue that it is a subsidy even after that is put upon it. Let us see what Senators who have been so anxious about subsidies have done on this very bill, and let us see what democrats in the House and in the Senate, who as yet have a majority of both bodies, have done in reference to the matter of voting subsidies to foreign ships and foreign countries. I will read a proviso in the appropriation bill which follows the appropriation I have just read:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General is authorized to pay to the colonies of New Zealand and New South Wales so much of the cost of the overland transportation of the British closed mails to and from Australia as he may deem just, not to exceed one-half of said cost; and the sum of $40,000 is hereby appropriated for that purpose.

What is that? The two colonies of New Zealand and New South Wales have made by colonial legislation a subsidy of $450,000 per annum to two lines of steamships sailing between those colonies and San Francisco. One of the lines is an American-owned line, and the other is a British line. The American mails are carried upon these steamships, and we pay the sea postage under this very appropriation to those ships for carrying that mail. In addition thereto we subsidize them to the extent of paying one-half of the cost of the transportation of the British mails clear across this continent upon our railroads, in order that we may compensate the British Government for having extended to them such a large amount of subsidy.

Something has been said about John Roach and Brazil. John Roach did receive a subsidy from Brazil, and the Brazilian Government made it a condition of that subsidy that the American Government should pay an equal sum—$100,000 I think it was. We refused to do that upon the ground that we were subsidizing John Roach, an American ship-builder. What have we done in this bill except to subsidize a British line to convey the mails from New Zealand and New South Wales to San Francisco by paying half the expenses of the transportation of the British closed mails across this continent?

Mr. WALLACE. It is not a British, but an American line.

Mr. MORGAN. That makes it only so much the worse. We are subsidizing an American line, then, that carries the British mails.

Mr. WALLACE. We are not subsidizing them; we simply give them the mails to carry.

Mr. MORGAN. We give them the sea postage for the transportation of these mails, and this bill provides for that. In addition to that, we give $45,000 for the transportation of those mails closed across this continent in order to give them that advantage. It cannot be that that is a special subsidy. It is nothing but a subsidy, and Senators who put that on the bill and recommend it here rise on this floor and inveigh against an amendment which does contain no feature of a subsidy, but leaves these mail contracts open to competition in bidding just as much as the star-route contracts are left open to all American citizens. We confine what we are doing to American citizens as contractors, but we say they ought to have the right to buy their ships wherever they can buy them for this particular purpose, and after they have been bought for this particular purpose and while they are employed in this particular service they ought to have the liberties, rights, and privileges of American-built ships.

I beg pardon on my part for having violated this fortieth rule. I really feel that I am loyal to the rules of the Senate, and I try to obey them as I go along usually; but older Senators than I am, who have been here much longer, have taken the liberty this afternoon of discussing this question out of order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WALLACE. I trust the Senator will not press that motion now.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I hope not. We want to get more work done yet to-day.

Mr. BURNSIDE. We have been here a long time, and the Senate is not in a condition to go on further to-day. I insist on my motion.

Mr. WALLACE. I hope the Senator will allow me to make a statement.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I withdraw the motion to allow the Senator to make a statement, if he will renew it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island withdraws the motion.

Mr. WALLACE. I am only anxious that the Senate should dispose of the question of order to-day. We can do it by a vote immediately, and the main question as to whether this proposition shall go upon the bill I am content shall go over until Monday, and we can dispose of the question on Monday.

Mr. ALLISON. Sitting it out.

Mr. WALLACE. Sitting it out Monday if it takes a night session.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Can we not fix some time Monday at which we shall get through with this bill and get to other things which are pressing upon the attention of the Senate?

Mr. WALLACE. It is very difficult to get an understanding of that kind in the Senate; but I desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to finish the bill on Monday. I hope we shall have a vote on the question of order now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is, is the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in order?

Mr. BUTLER. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

When vessels built in other countries are so accepted and employed, the same shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges secured by law to vessels built in the United States of America, except the privilege of engaging in the coastwise trade.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, to lay the amendment just reported on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. Does that carry the original amendment with it?

Mr. WALLACE. Let us understand what the effect of the motion is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair would hold that under the rules of the Senate, it would carry the amendment of the Senator from Texas, which has been ruled in order. It would not affect the bill. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Vermont to lay the amendment on the table.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 15, noes 21; no quorum voting.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TELLER. I will vote "no" to make a quorum. I am paired but will vote the same way as my pair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. Pending that call I move that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 12, noes 34.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate refuses to adjourn, and the question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. WALLACE. I call for another vote by a division on that question.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply desire to say that if the yeas and nays are called on the motion to amend made by the Senator from Alabama, I shall vote that the amendment is not in order. I desire, however, to say that I am in entire accord with the principle of that amendment, and if my friend from Alabama will bring it in as a separate proposition I shall vote for it with a great deal of pleasure. But I do not believe it is in order, and therefore shall vote that it is not in order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that after the pairs are taken out there is no quorum present, and I ask that he allow the bill to go over until Monday.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Cannot we have an understanding that we shall have it ended some time on Monday?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am ready for that, but there is no quorum present after the pairs are taken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, to table the amendment, upon which the Senator from Tennessee has called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to a division if there is a quorum present. I will withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again and take another count by a division.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to understand the force of that vote. Would it carry with it the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas himself?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling of the present occupant of the chair is that tabling this amendment tables the amendment of the Senator from Texas. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, to table the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BECK. Before that vote——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate can only proceed by consent, the motion being to lay on the table.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to state I am not at liberty to vote at all, being paired. I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and cannot vote at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 21; no quorum voting.

Mr. TELLER and others. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not vote upon the last question because I was paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] at the instance of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] I am also paired upon this question which is now about to be submitted to the Senate, and I shall not vote. If the Senator from Kansas were here, he would vote, I presume, as I am informed by the Senator from Maine, "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. INGALLS. Did not the last vote disclose the want of a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The last vote did.

Mr. INGALLS. And can the yeas and nays be ordered when there is no quorum present?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was being done by unanimous consent. If the Senator from Kansas objects it cannot proceed.

Mr. CONKLING. To what has unanimous consent been given?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks unanimous consent was given to the ordering of the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. CONKLING. My consent was not given, and I was here. I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll to ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WHYTE, (when his name was called.) I have been paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] but with the understanding that I should vote if there was not a quorum at any time.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I see by the roll-call that there are just forty Senators here. Taking out the pairs, it is manifest that there is no quorum present, and I think it would be wise to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call discloses forty-six Senators present.

Mr. WALLACE. With the understanding that immediately after the disposition of the routine morning business—not after the close of the morning hour—on Monday I shall ask the Senate to take up and finish the bill before the Senate adjourns on Monday, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 12, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

TAX ON WEISS BEER.

Mr. CARLISLE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with an amendment, House bill No. 6983, to regulate the collection of the tax on weiss beer; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KING. I rise to a privileged report.

Mr. TUCKER. I have a report to make from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to recognize gentlemen in the order of their committees. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.]

ALL SOULS CHURCH, WASHINGTON.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 349) authorizing the remission or refunding the duty on a painted glass window from London, England, for All Souls church, in Washington; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

EXPORT TAX ON TOBACCO, ETC.

Mr. TUCKER, from the same committee, also, by unanimous consent, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 6592, a bill (H. R. No. 7161) to repeal so much of section 3385 of the Revised Statutes as imposes an export tax on tobacco, &c.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KING. I desire to make a privileged report.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WARNER. I call for the regular order. Let us have a morning hour in which these reports can be made.

Mr. ATKINS. If the regular order is demanded, I will move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. CLYMER. I desire to report from the Committee on Appropriations the Army appropriation bill with the Senate amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that unanimous consent should be given for that purpose.

Mr. ATKINS. Does it require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair hardly thinks that it does.

Mr. CONGER. If it is a privileged report, then it can come in at a time when other business is not so pressing.

The SPEAKER. The object of the Chair is to facilitate the transaction of the most important business by the House, and if forced to do so the Chair would recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] as entitled at this time to make the report as a privileged report.

Mr. ATKINS. There will be no objection, I suppose.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLYMER, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back, with the Senate amendments thereto, the bill (H. R. No. 6719) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 13, 14, 16, and 17.

The committee recommend non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 11, 12, and 15.

The committee recommend that Senate amendment number 2 be concurred in with an amendment; to strike out the last four words, "and length of service."

Mr. CLYMER. I desire to explain briefly to the House wherein the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence and wherein they recommend non-concurrence with the Senate amendments, and the reasons therefor.

The first amendment of the Senate in which concurrence is recommended is the amendment numbered 3. It is a mere transfer of a provision in the bill as it passed the House from one portion of the bill to another.

The next amendment in which concurrence is recommended is amendment No. 4, in lines 59 and 60 of the printed bill. As the bill passed the House it provided for one retired ordnance sergeant. Since the bill passed the House it has been ascertained that there are two retired ordnance sergeants, and the Senate amendment is to provide for two retired ordnance sergeants, instead of one.

Amendment No. 5 of the Senate is merely a verbal amendment. Amendment 6 of the Senate relates to the transfer of a provision of the bill from one portion to another. It is the transfer of the following provision to a preceding portion of the bill:

And for payment of any such officers as may be in service, either upon the active or retired list, during the year ending June 30, 1882, in excess of the numbers for each class provided for in this act.

The next amendment in which concurrence is recommended is amendment No. 7, commencing in line 83 of the bill. It is to insert a provision allowing to the Lieutenant-General of the Army $100 per month for commutation of quarters.

The next amendment in which concurrence is recommended is amendment No. 8, in line 123 of the printed bill, to insert the words "and lights" before the words "for offices," &c. It is in the portion of the bill making appropriation for quartermaster supplies, and is intended to provide lights for offices, enlisted men, hospitals, &c.

The next amendment of the Senate in which concurrence is recommended is an amendment numbered 9, in line 136 of the printed bill, increasing the appropriation for the regular supplies of the Quartermaster's Department from $3,250,000 to $3,500,000. It is an increase of the appropriation by $250,000. It is made by the Senate for this reason: When the bill passed the House it contained a reappropriation of the amount of $564,714.25. The Senate disagreed with the House in making that reappropriation and determined that it was better to allow the law to stand as it is, and to appropriate directly what was needed instead of reappropriating any unexpended balance, so that the unexpended balances in the Quartermaster's and other departments of the Army shall be covered into the Treasury at the end of two years, according to the law as it now stands.

While the Committee on Appropriations of the House, when they prepared this bill, thought it would be well, as there were large amounts which had been appropriated in former years for the Quartermaster's Department still unexpended, to reappropriate a portion of that money, still that committee does not deem it expedient to differ with the Senate in regard to this question of reappropriations, especially as the Senate Committee on Appropriations seemed to be unanimously of the opinion that instead of making any reappropriation we had better make direct appropriations. The House committee therefore recommend concurrence in that amendment of the Senate.

The next amendment of the Senate in which concurrence is recommended is amendment No. 10, commencing in line 138 of the printed bill. It is to insert the following:

Provided, That there shall be no discrimination in the issue of forage against officers serving east of the Mississippi River, provided they are required by law to be mounted, and actually keep and own their animals.

In 1879, in the Army appropriation bill of that year, it was provided that forage should not be allowed to officers serving east of the Mississippi River. Complaint was made that great injustice was done by that provision of the Army appropriation bill of 1879. The Senate Committee on Appropriations unanimously hold that there was no well founded reason why officers serving east of the Mississippi River should not receive forage while those serving west of the Mississippi River should receive it. There seemed to be no reason why an officer of the Army serving in Saint Louis should receive forage while an officer serving on the opposite bank of the Mississippi should not receive it. It was deemed a merely arbitrary line for which no good reason could be given. After full consideration of the subject, the House Committee on Appropriations felt that justice required us to accede to this proposition. The provision is guarded as well as we could guard it. I will read the provision which the Senate attached:

Provided, That there shall be no discrimination in the issue of forage against officers serving east of the Mississippi River, provided they are required by law to be mounted, and actually keep and own their animals.

We do not see why officers who are required to keep horses, and who actually do own them and pay for their feed, should receive no allowance for such expenses while serving east of the Mississippi, although officers serving west of the Mississippi receive such allowance under precisely similar circumstances. This consideration has commended itself to our sense of justice; and therefore we have recommended concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. How long has this discrimination existed?

Mr. CLYMER. Since 1879. It has created great dissatisfaction, causing a feeling that gross injustice was done to officers serving east of the Mississippi River.

The thirteenth amendment (in which the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence) increases the appropriation for clothing $100,000. This comes under the same considerations as the amendment increasing by $250,000 the appropriation for Quartermaster's supplies.

The fourteenth amendment strikes out in lines 227 to 234 the provision as passed by the House for the reappropriation of unexpended balances. In this, as I have already stated, we recommend concurrence.

The fifteenth amendment (in which we recommend non-concurrence) provides that $50,000 may be used, under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the manufacture or purchase of magazine guns.

The sixteenth and seventeenth amendments, in lines 301 to 302, are merely verbal.

We have recommended non-concurrence in the first amendment, increasing from $75,000 to $97,000 the appropriation for expenses of recruiting and transportation of recruits. We have made this recommendation for the purpose of being able to confer with the Senate committee as to the necessity there may be for this increase. This is a mere matter of precaution, which we deem proper on the part of the House.

The amendment numbered 11 is with reference to the provision in lines 200 to 202 on the subject of land-grant railroads. The provision as passed by the House was submitted by the Quartermaster-General of the Army, and we deemed it a proper one. The Senate has inserted an amendment as to the propriety of which the House Committee on Appropriations were not determined. We felt it to be the safer course to non-concur, so that in conference with the Senate committee, and upon consultation with the Quartermaster-General and the Auditor of Railroads, we may agree upon some provision which shall absolutely protect the rights of the Government under any circumstances. The twelfth amendment of the Senate adds at the end of line 210 a provision with reference to this same subject of land-grant railroads, and we have recommended non-concurrence for the same reason.

The second amendment is to insert after the word "pay," in line 48, this provision:

And the actual time of service in the Army or Navy, or both, shall be allowed all officers in computing their pay and length of service.

We deemed it entirely equitable that the actual time served by an officer in the Army or Navy should be allowed in computing his pay; but it was not deemed wise that this should in every case be counted in determining length of service, as it might create great confusion and give rank which would not be right. The committee did not deem it just that service at the Naval Academy or at West Point should be counted in giving rank. Therefore we recommend that the House concur in this amendment, with an amendment striking out the words "and length of service."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the amendments.

Mr. VALENTINE. What is the recommendation of the committee with reference to the amendment referred to in regard to computing length of service?

Mr. CLYMER. We recommend the striking out of the words "and length of service," because otherwise the provision would change, as we think improperly, the relative rank of officers.

Mr. VALENTINE. I think the Senate is right on that point; and I want to vote that way.

Mr. HAWLEY. I believe the gentleman, if he considers the question, will find that he is mistaken. Suppose two young men are commissioned as first lieutenants on the same day—one of them appointed from civil life and the other coming from West Point. We do not think it proper that in such case the young man appointed from West Point should have four years' advantage by reason of his service at the Military Academy.

Mr. CLYMER. It would work great inequality, which we think was not intended by the Senate. To prevent misconstruction we have recommended an amendment striking out the words "and length of service."

The Senate amendments in which concurrence was recommended were concurred in; those in which non-concurrence was recommended were non-concurred in; and the amendment of the Senate to which an amendment was reported from the Committee on Appropriations was concurred in as amended.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ANDERSON. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to a question of personal privilege. Yesterday when the bill authorizing the erection of a public building at Leavenworth, Kansas, was under consideration, the following proceedings occurred:

The State of Kansas having been called.

Mr. ANDERSON said: I call up the bill (H. R. No. 6013) for a public building at Leavenworth, Kansas, reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. Speaker, is it in order to make a statement before objection is called for?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The rule provides the objections shall be in order after the reading of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is it in order to call for the reading of the report before objections are called for?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state in connection with this bill that heretofore by consent the House adopted an arrangement by which bills for public buildings should be taken up in their order on the Calendar. But the rule recently adopted, the Chair thinks, destroys that arrangement to the extent of allowing a member in this hour to call up such a bill. The positive rule operates as against the understanding. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] Six gentlemen rising object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I make the point that two gentlemen were counted who were not rising to object. I will state there is no public building in that State now.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen who rise to object are the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD,] the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BOUCK,] the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SIMONTON,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER]—six. The Chair is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON. All right. I have got the names, which is what I wanted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, nobody can hear what is going on in the Hall.

The SPEAKER. It is because members will not preserve order. The Sergeant-at-Arms will request members to resume their seats and preserve order.

Mr. ANDERSON. The new rule provides that a bill shall be considered unless five members rise in their seats to object. Yesterday upon the announcement by the Chair that the requisite number of gentlemen had objected, I asked for a recount by making the point that two gentlemen were counted who were not rising to object. Some time afterward I was surprised at the intimation by a gentleman that this request for a recount was being construed on the floor as a reflection by me upon the personal veracity or fairness of the Speaker, in which view I found that gentleman to concur; and upon examining the RECORD there is foundation for such construction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have too much respect for you personally, and too square an opinion of the non-partisan fairness which characterizes your rulings in the chair, to be capable of intentionally laying a foundation for any such reflection; and I have altogether too much respect for my own sense of justice to permit an injustice done by me to anybody to remain uncorrected. So far from having any desire to question your count or to place the Chair in an unpleasant light, the thought never even entered my mind that I was so doing. If it had, I would not have made the point. And on reading my language I find that it may convey an impression wholly different from the only one which I designed to convey.

This new rule is so new, and the constructions placed upon it are so various, that none of us exactly know just what is proper and what is not. I believed yesterday that I had an undoubted right to ask for a recount, and that the exercise of this right could in no proper way be construed as an imputation upon either the accuracy or impartiality of the Chair. And that is precisely my belief to-day after an examination of the matter.

Take the instance of a viva voce vote and of the demand for a division, does anybody construe such a demand by a member as a reflection upon the Chair? Or take the instance, exactly analogous to the case in point, where, after a rising vote, and after the Chair has counted members standing in their places, tellers are demanded; is such a demand construed as an imputation upon the Chair? Most certainly not. And after a division by tellers nothing is more common than a call for yeas and nays; but nobody ever supposed that the object in calling for yeas and nays is that of reflecting on either the honor or the fidelity of the tellers. These several demands are made from wholly different motives and to effect wholly different objects, such as gaining time to explain a subject to members, or for the purpose of seeing how they vote, or to put them on record. It was from such motives, and not at all with the purpose of questioning the fidelity of the Speaker's count, that I asked for a recount.

It often happens in a rising vote that members are standing who do not know what question is pending or that a vote is being taken, and who therefore certainly cannot intend to vote; yet the Chair is compelled to count them.

Now, yesterday I noticed gentlemen over the way standing, but in earnest conversation, one of whom I thought to be the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] and whom, of course, the Speaker was bound to count. One purpose I had in asking for a recount was to avail myself of the hope that my friend from Ohio was expounding his views on the silver question and was not opposed to allowing the House the simple chance of voting one way or the other on a bill authorizing the erection of a public building in the largest city in a State having a million of people. But, unfortunately for me, my esteemed friend had not gotten started on finances so early in the day. I express my sincere regret that he had not.

Another purpose I had in requesting a recount was because, owing to the rapidity of the proceeding, I had not seen all of the gentlemen who objected, and I wanted to know who they were, as a matter of curiosity and as reliable data for a careful study of human nature. The science of psychology is as interesting as it is exhaustless; and there are some data to be obtained on this floor respecting those forces which shape the actions of men that are rarely met elsewhere. I am fond of that science, and pounced upon the opportunity of yesterday just as an entomologist does on a new bug. And I am glad that the data has been preserved—preserved in the RECORD—though at the time I only wished personal information.

The reason for that, Mr. Speaker, was this: there is no district in the Union more vigorously republican than the one for which I appear; nor is there any republican on this floor who is more sincerely stalwart than am I. All of the gentlemen who objected were democrats. One was from Alabama, one from Tennessee, two from Wisconsin, one from Ohio, one from Pennsylvania, and one from New York.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. Is it permissible under the rules, when a gentleman rises to make an apology to the Chair, to conclude his remarks by making attacks on other members of the House?

Mr. ANDERSON. I have not concluded my personal explanation, and am exactly in the line of it. I am showing why I did not intend to say what it was supposed I had said.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will confine himself to his personal explanation.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am doing that just exactly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is making the point it is not a part of a personal explanation to attack other members.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not attacking anybody.

The SPEAKER. In their representative capacity.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not attacking them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point well taken.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not attacking them. I am simply stating a fact. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, two years ago, out of the thirty-one counties then voting in my district, there was only one of them in which the democrats had a majority, and that one was the identical county in which this building was to be erected.

Mr. HOUSE. I do not think the speech the gentleman is now making is connected in any respect with what may be deemed properly to be a personal explanation. He is discussing the question of the political complexion of his district. We have no time to spend on that, and I object to his proceeding in that line.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will confine himself to the question of personal privilege.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am; and I submit I am in order, Mr. Speaker. I frankly believe that or I would not do it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt the gentleman believes it, and yet it is not in order under the unanimous consent granted.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not understand it is by unanimous consent. I understand I have the right to this explanation.

The SPEAKER. It would require unanimous consent if the gentleman were to speak outside of the personal matter complained of.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not speaking outside of it. I know what I am going to say, and these gentlemen do not. [Laughter.]

The democratic vote in the city of Leavenworth gave my opponent a majority of 29.

Mr. BRAGG. I insist the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will be permitted to go on as I wish to reply to him. I have a grievance myself.

Mr. CAMP. Let the gentleman from Kansas finish his remarks.

Mr. SIMONTON. I am one of the gentlemen alluded to as objecting yesterday. I feel no sensitiveness at all, and I desire the gentleman should proceed. I wish merely to say I did not object to his bill because he was a republican, but was actuated by motives arising from my duty as a Representative upon this floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. Nor do I make this personal explanation for the reason that gentlemen fear I am making it. I want to plead with them. [Cries of "Go on."]

Mr. BRAGG. It is on that point I make my point of order. The gentleman had permission to rise to a question of personal privilege, which was to explain the action of yesterday. Now he announces his purpose in continuing his remarks to plead with us to procure the passage of the bill. He has confessed himself this is not a question of personal privilege, and is now arguing in favor of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from Kansas; but the point of order having been made, the Chair holds that he must confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am confining myself to the point of order, and I have been doing it all along.

And that city of Leavenworth is the one which the democratic gentlemen punished yesterday. It is true that a majority of twenty-nine is not very much; but when it is cast by the only county in a district four hundred and twenty-five miles long, that county ought to be encouraged.

Mr. BRAGG. I insist, Mr. Speaker, upon the point of order which I have made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must rule that anything that does not relate to the question of privilege directly involved is out of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, I will ask consent to print two pages, as gentlemen object so much.

Mr. FINLEY. I object.

Mr. ANDERSON. All right, then, I will read them.

Mr. BRAGG. But I insist on the point of order that the gentleman has no right to go beyond a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin insists upon the point of order. The Chair is bound to rule that the gentleman from Kansas confine himself directly to the question.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have but a few more words to add. I was about to say that they will feel toward you as Cæsar did toward Brutus, and they will use strong adjectives. Would it not be better for the democratic majority of this House, in the few remaining hours of its life, to pass this bill as a mere matter of party gratitude, if not as an act of fairness to a million of people in whose State but one other building is authorized, and it has not been erected——

Mr. BRAGG. I must insist on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will confine himself to the question of privilege.

Mr. ANDERSON. Very well, then, I will come at once to the point, as I have no desire to complicate the Chair.

If I was unfortunate in using language capable of a construction which was not intended, it may be that the democrats were far more unfortunate in punishing their own friends, even though Kansas is a gloriously republican State.

After this statement, the House will see that I had no intention whatever of questioning the rectitude and fair play of the Chair; and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that nothing could be more foreign to my own feelings and convictions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very much obliged to the gentleman from Kansas, and entirely satisfied with his statement.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEE ON INTEROCEANIC SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. KING. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to make some privileged reports from the Committee on Interoceanic Ship Canal.

Mr. VALENTINE. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order.

The Clerk will report the title of the bills reported from the Committee on Interoceanic Ship Canal.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 6609) to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.

The SPEAKER. The bill is reported favorably from the Committee on Interoceanic Ship-Canal, and will be referred to the House Calendar and the accompanying report printed.

Mr. KING. There is also another bill reported from the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to incorporate the Interoceanic Ship-Railway Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. PAGE. I object to the reception of that report. I do not object to the first, but to the second.

Mr. WARNER. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Ohio objects to the reception of any of these reports, as I understand.

Mr. WARNER. We always get along better when we follow the regular order of business in the House. I therefore demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged report. The Chair understands this is a bill in reference to a railway——

Mr. PAGE. I do not object to the first, but to the second bill presented.

Mr. KING. On what ground does the gentleman object? This is a privileged report.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Ohio objects to all of them.

Mr. WARNER. If this is in pursuance of the regular order of business of the House I do not object, but under any other circumstances I do object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana claims the right to report as a question of privilege. The Chair will cause to be read the authority given to that committee by the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of eleven members be appointed, whose duty it shall be to examine into the subject of the selection of a suitable route for the construction of an interoceanic ship-canal across the American Isthmus; that all petitions, memorials, resolutions, bills, and reports on such canal or other mode of facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans be referred to that committee; and that they have authority to report to the House at any time such legislation as may be best adapted to secure such communication between said oceans.

Mr. KING. Now, what point does the gentleman from California make against that?

Mr. PAGE. The point that I make is that this is not a report coming from a majority of the Committee on Interoceanic Ship-Canal.

Mr. KING. The gentleman has no right to question that. I do not know how the gentleman can make that statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California will state his point of order.

Mr. PAGE. My point of order is that the bill or substitute purporting to be a report from that committee in reference to the Eads interoceanic ship-canal was never adopted, as the record will show, by a majority of the committee.

Mr. KING. What record?

Mr. PAGE. And I call for the reading of the report of the committee to see if it is signed by a majority of the members.

Mr. KING. That is entirely out of order.

The SPEAKER. That is unusual.

Mr. PAGE. I ask for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read a ruling which covers this ground.

The Clerk read as follows:

If it is disputed that a report has been ordered to be made by a committee the question of receiving must be put to the House.—Journal, second session Twenty-seventh Congress, page 1410.

Mr. WARNER. Does the Chair rule that this is a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair goes by the authority which the House gave to the committee, which has been read. That order gives this committee the right to report at any time touching a ship-canal across the Isthmus, and the right to report at any time carries with it the right to consider, but of course the right to consider subject to the rules.

Mr. VALENTINE. But this refers to a ship railway, as I understand.

Mr. CONGER. It refers to a ship-canal or other means of communication. I ask for the reading of the order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause it to be again read.

The order creating the committee was again read.

The SPEAKER. Under the authority given the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Louisiana. The point made by the gentleman from California now is that this is not a report from the committee, and under the practice of the House the Chair will submit the question to the House.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the name of the chairman of that committee be announced to the House.

The SPEAKER. Mr. KING, of Louisiana, is the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CONGER. And that is the gentleman who proposes to report the bill. I do not see how his right can be questioned if he is chairman of that committee.

Mr. REAGAN. The point of order was that this was not the report of the majority of the committee. It is not necessary it should be the report of a majority of the committee. It is the report of a majority of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not to judge as to whether a report is the report of a committee. That belongs to the committee. But the members of the committee having raised the issue, the question as to the reception of the report must be determined by the House.

Mr. KING. I state this is the report of that committee.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman to state if it is the report of a majority of a quorum.

Mr. KING. The report is made under the authority and by the order of a majority of a quorum of the committee.

Mr. ATKINS. Then there is a direct issue between the gentlemen.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that five members of the committee voted for and five against reporting the bill.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I call the gentleman to order. I say no gentleman, a member of a committee, has a right to refer to what has taken place in that committee until the report is received and before the House.

The SPEAKER. The report has been received.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. To make such a reference is against parliamentary practice everywhere.

The SPEAKER. The report has been received.

Mr. COX. I desire to inquire of the Chair what is the pending proposition?

The SPEAKER. The point of order is made by the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] that this is not the report of a majority of the committee, and the Chair has caused to be read what has been the practice of the House in such cases.

Mr. KING. And as the chairman of the committee I state this is a report from the majority of a quorum of that committee and presented by their order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no knowledge other than what he hears in connection with the case. He recognized the chairman of the committee to make a report by virtue of the authority given by the resolution creating the committee; and the report was brought to the desk and received, but is now questioned on a point of order, as has been stated.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I wish to say one word on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. PAGE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAGE. How can a report be objected to but by a member of the committee?

The SPEAKER. There is too much confusion prevailing. The House will come to order. Gentlemen will please take their seats.

Mr. KING. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KING. Is it competent for a member of this House to bring up and discuss on the floor of the House all that has occurred in a committee?

The SPEAKER. There have been cases where it has been questioned whether a report presented was the report of the committee.

Mr. KING. I have before me a precedent which I ask may be read to the House. I ask only for information on this point, whereby I may be guided. I should be glad to have the minutes of the committee on this entire point read to the House.

Mr. FRYE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FRYE. The chairman of the Committee on the Interoceanic Ship-Canal reported a bill to incorporate the Nicaragua Canal Company. That is now hanging in mid-air as I understand.

The SPEAKER. It is not. That was received without objection.

Mr. FRYE. Has it gone to the Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It has gone to the House Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. All right. I did not understand it had.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read the decision to which the gentleman from Louisiana refers.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is not in order to allude on the floor to anything that has taken place in committee, unless by a written report sanctioned by a majority of the committee.—Journals, 1, 26, page 418; 1, 31, page 393.

Mr. KING. Upon that I caution the gentleman from California against endeavoring to bring before the House except upon that written report any statement of his own regarding transactions that may have occurred in that committee.

The SPEAKER. The very point here is whether this is a report from the committee. The gentleman from California rises to contend against that proposition.

Mr. KING. My statement, as the chairman of the committee, is that it is the report of the committee, and I would like to know from the Chair what more he would require as authority. The precedent cited seals my lips further as to transactions in the committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the authority of the decision read a few moments ago the question whether a report has been ordered to be made by a committee may be disputed.

Mr. PAGE. I understand I have been recognized.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HASKELL. I think the gentleman from California will permit the interruption. If I understand the decision of the Chair it is when a report is objected to the House is called upon to decide whether or not it is to be considered. Am I correct in that?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read in the hearing of the House the action of the House on a former occasion referred to in the decision which has already been read. That will be the shortest way.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Gentry, from the Committee on the Public Lands, proposed to report a bill to repeal the proviso to the sixth section of the act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights," approved September 4, 1841.

When the bill was about to be handed in, Mr. Wise objected to its reception as a report of the committee, for reasons which he stated in writing, as follows:

"That a quorum of that committee was not present when the report was ordered to be made. The facts, as stated by three of the members of the committee, were that but five of the members of the committee were in the city; that these five members met in the committee-room on the morning of this day; that they discussed this report until after the meeting of the House; that, after the meeting of the House, and before any vote was put or taken in committee upon the bill, one of the members [Mr. Thompson of Mississippi] retired, to leave the committee without a quorum, because he could not obtain a postponement to a fuller meeting of the committee, and actually left the committee to consist of but four members; and, after his retiring, these four members decided to make this report, and accordingly have done so, to the House. Mr. Wise, on this statement of facts, submitted to the House, without disagreement, by Messrs. Gentry, Thompson, and Howard, of the committee, objected that this was no report, on the ground, first, that there was no quorum when the report was ordered by the four members of the committee only; and secondly, that the committee, even though there was a quorum present at the time of the decision to report, had no authority to sit during the session of the House without its special leave."

Mr. Howard stated "that before Mr. Thompson left the committee-room three of the five members present had given their opinions in favor of reporting the bill to the House, and two (one of whom was Mr. Thompson) against reporting it."

The Speaker stated that no question of order was involved; that the question Shall the bill be received as the report of the committee? was for the House alone to decide; and as the reception of the bill was objected to, that question would be put to the House.

The question was then put, under the operation of the previous question, And passed in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 78.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires also to have read another decision on the same subject, by Mr. Speaker Banks.

Mr. KING. The case just read does not touch the question.

The SPEAKER. It does touch the question as to the reception of the report.

Mr. KING. It does not touch the point as to the reception of this report, which is made by the order of a majority of the committee when there was a quorum present, and which quorum voted.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. A majority of a quorum.

Mr. HASKELL. I rose to a parliamentary inquiry which I have not completed.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Kansas allow the Chair to have read an extract from the proceedings of the House on July 1, 1856?

Mr. HASKELL. Certainly.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Howard, from the select committee, appointed under the resolutions of the House of the 19th of March last, to inquire into and collect evidence in regard to the troubles in Kansas, &c., submitted as a question of privilege a report in writing.

Mr. Houston made the point of order that inasmuch as it had been admitted that the paper presented had not been acted upon at a full meeting of the committee, it would not be received as the report of the committee.

The Speaker overruled the point of order on the ground that it was competent for a majority of the committee to act.

From this decision of the Chair Mr. Hendley S. Bennett appealed.

Pending which,

On motion of Mr. Lewis D. Campbell,

Ordered, That the said appeal be laid on the table.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HASKELL. Now, if the gentleman from California will allow me to conclude my inquiry, it will aid him in the point of order he desires to make.

Mr. PAGE. Allow me to get through. I have not stated the reason why I objected. If the gentleman will allow me to do so, I will yield the floor to him for any parliamentary inquiry or anything else.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the only question of difference between the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. KING,] the chairman of the committee, and myself is this: if that is the report of the majority of the committee, he has the right to make it; but I am here as a member of that committee to deny that it is in my judgment a report of the majority of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is clear on the point that a majority of a quorum of the committee has the right to report a bill.

Mr. PAGE. I claim that on Saturday last——

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. PAGE. I hope the gentleman will allow me to proceed.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I send to the desk the authority upon which I rely in making my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois rises to a point of order, that the gentleman from California has no right to proceed.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I do.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Illinois in support of his point of order cites what will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

When the report of a committee has been made, it is irregular, even though the report itself is under consideration, to allude to or introduce the committee or their proceedings in debate, except so far as they appear in the report itself, unless there is a motion made or to be made that the report be recommitted. The report of the committee appointed to inquire into the state of the impeachment against Governor Hastings having been brought up and read, and a motion made thereupon, one of the members of the committee proceeded to make some remarks upon the committee and its proceedings; but the speaker [Mr. Addington] called him to order and informed him that he could not regularly state to the house anything upon the subject of the report that was not in the report itself, unless he intended to move for its recommitment.—Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, section 1732.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak to my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order involved here is simply whether——

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Permit me one word. The point of order I make is that before the action of the committee can be inquired into, there must be a motion made to recommit, and then a motion to bring into the House the minutes of the committee. You cannot question the action of the committee in this collateral way.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER, (to Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois.) Why is the gentleman unwilling the House should know how the vote stood in the committee or what the proceedings were on that bill? Five of the committee are against that bill and I among the number.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I have the floor. I will tell the gentleman when the time comes. I will make the gentleman understand when the time comes.

Mr. KING, (addressing Mr. OSCAR TURNER.) There is no effort here to suppress evidence of any nature——

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I cannot hear the gentleman's remarks. The noise is so great——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ha order. The Chair is very clear in the opinion that a majority of a quorum of a committee has the authority to make a report.

Mr. KING. I ask the consent of the House that the journal of the Committee on Interoceanic Canal, showing the order under which I am acting, be read.

The SPEAKER. The point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SINGLETON] is that proceedings in committee cannot be alluded to.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. That is my point.

Mr. KING. If direct or tentative charges are to be made by the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OSCAR TURNER] against the majority of this committee, I think it a matter of personal privilege to have the record of the action of the committee placed before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks that the record of the committee be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not understand there is any dispute as to the question of fact. The question is whether a majority of a quorum of the committee agreed to the reporting of this bill to the House.

The SPEAKER. They have such power, and having such power the report can be received, but the Chair does not think that was the point of order made by the gentleman from California. The gentleman disputes the fact that this is the report of the committee.

Mr. COX. I reserve all points of order.

Mr. PAGE. If the House will only hear me, I will state my point of order.

Mr. KING. I rise first as to a matter of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has heard almost everybody else but the gentleman who makes the point of order, and he thinks it is now about time the gentleman from California should be heard.

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this question is to come in——

Mr. PAGE. I hope I will not be interrupted.

Mr. COX. I wish to say if this is to be received, then I reserve all points of order. There is money in it, and I want it to go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair at the proper time will recognize the gentleman on that point.

Mr. PAGE. I state on my authority as a member of the committee that if the Chair rules I have a right to refer to anything that occurs in committee——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so rule.

Mr. PAGE. Does he rule, then, that I have not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the practice has been to deny the right on the part of any member of a committee to allude in the House to what has occurred in the committee. These points, in the judgment of the Chair, should be settled in the committee.

Mr. PAGE. If I am ruled out from stating why this is not a report from the majority of the committee, that the committee stood five and five when the whole committee except myself who was absent on that occasion should have been recorded, then I withdraw my point of order and move to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Interoceanic Canal with instruction to strike out the $50,000,000.

Mr. KING. There is no $50,000,000 subsidy in it. If the gentleman states that, he states what is not in accordance with the facts. I further say he makes a misstatement when he says that five members of that committee voted for and five against the order to report this bill. Upon the same ground of privilege on which he stands in saying so, I state that the committee consists of eleven members; five voted for and four against ordering me to make that report, as the journal of the committee shows, and if the House will, it can see for itself.

Mr. PAGE. There is no question of veracity between the gentleman and myself.

Mr. KING. I hope not.

Mr. HASKELL. It is entirely easy, Mr. Speaker, to settle this matter if the honorable gentleman on my left will only hold a moment and allow the House to take cognizance of a simple fact. Under the rules of parliamentary proceeding of course it is impossible for the interior workings of a committee to be disclosed on this floor; but there is on the journal of that committee an accurate transcript of all the facts as they occurred in the committee. The gentleman from California will admit it, everybody will admit it, and I ask now in the interest of a settlement of this question that the journal of the committee may be read here in the House and then it will become apparent what the point is which the gentleman from California makes, and what point the gentleman from Louisiana makes, and then the House may come to an intelligent decision.

Mr. PAGE. As the Speaker ruled I had no right to reveal what occurred in the committee I shall certainly object to the transcript of the proceedings being read; for, without explanation, it would be of no use to the House. My point of order has been withdrawn, and while I am recognized by the Speaker I move to recommit to the committee with instructions to strike out that part of the bill which proposes a subsidy of $50,000,000 to these ship railways.

Mr. KING. I object to the motion and I deny there is any such clause in that bill.

Mr. HASKELL. Let it be done by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. PAGE. I object.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I deny he has the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask unanimous consent that each side shall have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Give me a moment. I say under the charges which have been made it is a right which follows the motion to recommit to demand that the minutes shall be read. It is a right which follows that motion and accompanies it under the circumstances. I want it read for the purpose of refuting the slander of the statement that there is a subsidy of $50,000,000 in this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be in order.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to lay the whole subject upon the table.

Mr. FRYE. I want to ask the attention of the chairman of the committee——

Mr. KING. The gentleman from Pennsylvania should permit this matter to come before the House, as it involves a question of importance, national and international.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana will please give his attention.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the gentleman's attention for a few moments, as there evidently is a little misapprehension or misunderstanding here, which is liable to end in a great deal of personal feeling and heat, if not explained. Now, as an opponent of the Eads's bill, I desire to state to this House that there is no question of fact at issue between the chairman of the Committee on the Interoceanic Ship-Canal and the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.] There is nothing which calls into question the personal integrity of either gentleman in this issue. It all comes purely and simply from a difference of opinion as to the construction of parliamentary law bearing upon it. That is all there is of it.

Mr. KING. There is no room even for that question. I am acting under a positive order of a majority of a quorum of the committee.

Mr. PAGE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have moved to recommit this to the Committee on the Interoceanic Ship-Canal, with instructions to strike out from it all that part of the bill with reference to a guarantee on the part of the United States of the interest upon the bonds or stocks of any such corporation. I do not desire to make a speech upon it, and therefore will move the previous question upon my motion.

Mr. KING. I object to any motion while the motion I have made is pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Louisiana that this motion comes in under authority of the rules of the House, and at the proper time must be regarded and entertained by the Chair.

Mr. KING. I object to any amendment at all. I want the report accepted or rejected as a whole.

Mr. PAGE. The House can do that if it desires. My motion is to test the sense of the House upon the question.

Mr. KING. If it is in order, I ask as a matter of personal privilege that the order of the committee to report this bill, or the order authorizing me as chairman of the committee to report it, may be read in justice to myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Louisiana that a motion is pending which will obviate the necessity of reading the proceedings in committee.

Mr. KING. But I ask that this be read in justice to myself, as my orders from a committee have been called into question.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, the motion that I have made is to recommit to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize that motion in a moment. The Chair thinks, however, that the gentleman from Louisiana should be allowed to make his explanation.

Mr. KING. What I ask is as a matter of personal privilege, that the order directing the chairman of the committee to make this report be read to the House.

The SPEAKER. That has been objected to on both sides of the House, and also the reading of the record of the committee has been objected to. The Chair must recognize the objections, as the gentleman from Louisiana will perceive.

Mr. ATKINS. What does the gentleman from Louisiana want to do with it?

Mr. KING. I want to have it printed and placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope that will be allowed. There should be no objection to that.

Mr. PAGE. I have no objection to its being printed; if that is all.

Mr. KING. And placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. PAGE. I certainly object to its going upon the Calendar. I insist upon the motion that it be recommitted to the committee with instructions to strike out all of that part of it which guarantees the interest of the stock or bonds by the Government.

The SPEAKER. That motion the Chair thinks is in order.

Mr. PAGE. Then I demand the previous question upon it.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the bill——

Mr. PAGE. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. CONGER. But I have a right to be heard on my motion.

Mr. PAGE. I am still occupying the floor.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has made his motion. I move now as a privileged motion under the rule that the bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which motion must be first put under the rule.

Mr. PAGE. I ask the parliamentary question if this motion is in order after I have called the previous question and have not yielded the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman's parliamentary question.

Mr. PAGE. I say is it in order for the gentleman to move the reference of this matter to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union while my motion for the previous question is pending and while I still occupy the floor?

Mr. KING. I think I still have the floor as chairman of the committee in charge of this measure. The gentleman from California has no right to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

XIII, 2. The question of reference of any proposition, other than that reported from a committee, shall be decided without debate, in the following order, viz: A standing committee, a select committee; but the reference of a proposition reported by a committee, when demanded, shall be decided according to its character, without debate, in the following order, viz: House Calendar, Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Committee of the Whole House, a standing committee, a select committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now cause to be read the rule regulating the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

XVII, 1. It shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to entertain and submit a motion to commit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee; and a motion to lay upon the table shall be in order on the second and third reading of a bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California made his motion and demanded the previous question.

Mr. KING. I made a motion previously that the bill be reported to the House and printed and placed on the Calendar, and I call the previous question on that.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from Louisiana had not the floor to do that.

Mr. KING. I had the floor in personal charge of the bill as coming from the committee.

Mr. PAGE. I had the floor to make a motion to recommit, which I have made and on which I have called the previous question.

The SPEAKER. If the motion was made by the gentleman from Louisiana and the previous question was called, the motion of the gentleman from California would be in order to recommit under the rules. The rule provides that this motion is in order either before or after the previous question is demanded.

Mr. CONGER. I admit the right of the gentleman from California to make his motion and demand the previous question, which was entertained; but pending the demand for the previous question I availed myself of the right under the rule to move to commit to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PAGE. During which time I was on the floor, and still occupied it, and the gentleman had no power or right to make the motion.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman could not be on the floor after his motion was submitted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] who has charge of the bill. He now moves——

Mr. COX. I rise to a parliamentary question. I move to lay this whole subject on the table.

Mr. KING. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion. The Chair recognizes the gentleman in charge of the bill to make his motion; that is, to print and refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and on that the gentleman demands the previous question. The gentleman states that was his object.

Mr. KING. That was my object.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair recognizes the gentleman when he so states.

Mr. PAGE. What does the Chair do with the gentleman from California? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves to commit with instructions. Pending that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moves to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. ACKLEN rose.

Mr. COX. There can be no debate on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. ACKLEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ACKLEN. If the motion of the gentleman from New York shall prevail, does that dispose of this subject entirely?

The SPEAKER. It does.

The question having been taken on a viva voce division,

The SPEAKER said: The Chair thinks the ayes have it. The ayes have it, and the subject is laid on the table.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the morning hour of to-day for the call of committees for reports be dispensed with.

The question being taken on Mr. ATKINS's motion, there were—ayes 114, noes 26.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour for the call provided for in the new rule now begins at twenty minutes past twelve o'clock; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] is recognized on the unfinished business in that hour.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to make a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state what is his request.

Mr. BLOUNT. On yesterday I was absent by leave of the House assisting in the preparation of the sundry civil appropriation bill. I inadvertently let the time pass when this call commenced, and not coming to the House till half past eleven was not here to avail myself of my privilege under the new rule. I desire to call up a bill which is the unanimous report of a committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would prefer to recognize the gentleman from Georgia to request unanimous consent after this hour shall have expired, so as not to interfere with the call proceeding in regular order. The Chair has no doubt the House will, under the circumstances, the gentleman having been absent on official business under the direction of the House, then give him the opportunity he desires.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] is recognized.

IMPORTATION OF SHIP-BUILDING MATERIALS.

Mr. BOWMAN. I call up the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday under the new rule, being the bill (H. R. No. 5989) regulating the importation of raw materials to be manufactured in the United States and used in the construction and repair of vessels employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, or built for foreign account.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all materials or articles wholly of foreign growth or production which are manufactured in the United States and used in the construction, equipment, and repair of vessels to be employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, or built for foreign account, may be imported in bond, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and upon proof that such materials have been manufactured and used for the duties aforesaid no duties shall be paid thereon.

SEC. 2. That sections 2513 and 2514 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and so much of section 5 of the act of February 8, 1875, as is inconsistent herewith, be, and the same hereby are, repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering this bill at this time?

Mr. CLYMER and Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania, rose to object.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the House to give me one moment before gentlemen object. The Committee on Ways and Means authorized me whenever this bill came up for consideration by unanimous consent to offer a substitute for the bill. This bill is too broad in its terms. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to accept the substitute.

Mr. BOWMAN. I accept the substitute and ask that it be read.

Mr. CLYMER. The bill and substitute being still open to objection?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the right of objection. The Chair thinks it is no more than fair that the substitute should be read which the gentleman from Massachusetts accepts, with a view to the House voting on it.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say I hope the substitute will be passed. I should have objected to the original bill.

The Clerk read the proposed substitute, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert as follows:

"That copper and spelter of foreign growth or production which are manufactured in the United States and used in the construction, equipment, and repair of vessels to be employed in the foreign trade or built for foreign account may be imported in bond under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and upon proof that such materials have been manufactured and used for the purposes aforesaid no duties shall be paid thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. BUCKNER. Is that an amendment which has been read?

The SPEAKER. It is an amendment in the nature of a substitute. Is there objection? The Chair sees no one rising to object, and hears no voice objecting.

Mr. BOWMAN. I claim my five minutes. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes that gentlemen will not interrupt the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is on the floor and entitled to five minutes.

Mr. BOWMAN. I yield my time to the gentleman who reported the substitute from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. VALENTINE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VALENTINE. I want to know if the substitute is objected to whether we can pass the original bill? Is the substitute the only bill before the House?

The SPEAKER. The original bill is still before the House, and if the substitute should be voted down the original bill would then come up.

Mr. VALENTINE. Would an opportunity be then offered for explanation of the original bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be fair if five minutes for debate is not previously exhausted.

Mr. BOWMAN. I accepted the substitute, and understand that is the only thing before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi called up a particular bill. That bill is before the House. But the gentleman yielded to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] who said on behalf of the Committee on Ways and Means he proposed a substitute for the bill called up by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOWMAN. I yield my five minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. FRYE. I will not occupy three minutes. By the act of 1872 copper and composition metal were admitted free of duty for the construction and repair of certain ships. The Treasury Department construed that to be yellow-metal sheathing. Subsequently, in 1875, yellow-metal sheathing was admitted free of duty by name. There were $2,000,000 invested in manufacture of yellow-metal sheathing in Massachusetts alone. Those manufacturers were compelled to pay five cents a pound duty on copper and one and one-half cents per pound duty on spelter. When metal sheathing was admitted absolutely free of duty that shut the doors of those manufactories and turned out of work every employé in them.

This bill simply provides that the copper and spelter which these manufacturers use to make yellow-metal sheathing shall be admitted free of duty, still leaving yellow-metal to come in free. The bill is fair and just.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. HATCH. Before the vote is taken I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] if this is the unanimous report of the Committee on Ways and Means? We could not distinctly understand over here what the gentleman said on that point.

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on Ways and Means unanimously consented that this substitute should be put in place of the original bill, the committee being opposed to the original bill.

The SPEAKER. And the committee favors the passage of the substitute?

Mr. FRYE. The committee favors the passage of the substitute.

Mr. CARLISLE. I desire to state that the Committee on Ways and Means unanimously agreed that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] should move this substitute in lieu of the original bill; but some members of the committee are opposed to the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] to inquire whether this substitute meets the unanimous approval of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. FRYE. As an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. BRIGHT. I desire to move an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is that in order?

The SPEAKER. No previous question is pending.

Mr. ATKINS. Can an amendment be offered under this new rule?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

The amendment of Mr. BRIGHT was read, as follows:

Add to the substitute the following:

"That salt imported into the United States shall be admitted free of duty from and after the 1st day of May next."

Mr. BOWMAN. I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to the subject-matter of the bill under consideration, and the further point that there is a bill upon the same subject now pending before a committee of this House.

Mr. FRYE. That amendment is clearly not germane. There are a half dozen bills before the Committee on Ways and Means for the purpose of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Clause 4 of Rule XXI will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there a bill pending before this House or any committee upon the subject of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT?]

Mr. CONGER. There is another bill pending before the Committee on Ways and Means, perhaps two or three of them, to admit salt free of duty.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MILLS. Does the Chair rule that it is in the power of any member to prevent legislation by this House simply by introducing a bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so rule.

Mr. MILLS. The bill now before the House proposes to put certain articles on the free list. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] proposes to extend that list so as to include salt. It is certainly germane to add a single item to such a proposition as is pending before the House.

Mr. CONGER. The five minutes allowed under the new rule for debate has expired, and I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas on the point of order.

Mr. MILLS. A bill is introduced to put salt on the free list; other bills are introduced to put other articles on the free list. The bill now before the House proposes to put certain articles on the free list, which articles are perhaps embraced in other bills. Now is the House to be prohibited from amending any bill which embraces one of the items that may be contained in other bills? The gentleman who offers this amendment [Mr. BRIGHT] takes one solitary article from another bill, the article of salt, and proposes to add it to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to admit that there is another bill for this purpose pending before the House.

Mr. MILLS. I admit that there is a bill pending to put salt on the free list.

The SPEAKER. Then the rule which has just been read is imperative, and the Chair is compelled to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. BOWMAN. I now demand——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. BOWMAN. I demand the previous question.

Mr. VALENTINE. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. VALENTINE. Under the new rule can this hour be used up by members offering amendments to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that the new rule cuts off amendments. It confines the debate to five minutes.

Mr. VALENTINE. Then the whole hour may be occupied on one bill.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the House to determine.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let my amendment be read.

Mr. BOWMAN. I have called the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] must be recognized by the Chair as having control of the pending proposition.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] offered an amendment——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] calls for the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] offered an amendment, the demand for the previous question not having been then made. The Speaker ruled the amendment out of order, and I instantly rose and offered another amendment before the previous question was called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair always takes the word of a member on a question of this sort. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] states that he called the previous question before the gentleman from Illinois was recognized.

Mr. HORR. So he did.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not think the gentleman from Massachusetts will make that statement.

The SPEAKER. He does so state; and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] confirms the statement.

Mr. BOWMAN. Before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] was recognized, I called the previous question.

Mr. CHALMERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the previous question should be voted down, will that leave the bill before the House subject to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It would. The member introducing a proposition, having the right to its control, has the right to test the sense of the House upon ordering the previous question; but if the sense of the House is against that proposition, then the measure is open to amendment.

The question being taken on ordering the previous question, there were—ayes 105, noes 49.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BOWMAN called for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a question of order. I do not believe that this House understood when the rule was adopted that bills coming up in this way would be subject to amendment, because that would open the door to all sorts of legislation. Now, do I understand the Chair to decide that the rule does permit the offering of amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the rule gives the right to the member recognized, whenever five members do not object, to call a bill up for consideration, and that the debate shall be limited to five minutes; but there is nothing in the rule which precludes the offering of amendments. In this case the gentleman from Massachusetts himself admitted an amendment, and of course that brought it under the general rule which allows further amendment not beyond the second degree. This is the reason the Chair has entertained amendments.

Mr. ATKINS. That virtually defeats the object of the rule.

Mr. CONGER. Of course any amendment offered must be submitted to objection by five members, otherwise a bill introduced without objection might afterward be changed entirely by way of amendment.

Mr. ROBESON. The Chair did decide that the right of objection applied to the substitute which was the first amendment. Of course it follows that when another amendment comes in, presenting substantially a new bill, the right of objection will still remain.

The SPEAKER. On this point the Chair will hereafter make a closer examination, and if he should think he is not absolutely correct will review his decision; but he would now express the opinion, not as a finality, that a bill coming before the House under the new rule is subject to amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would not the Chair recognize the gentleman calling up a bill to move the previous question——

The SPEAKER. Certainly; and the Chair has done so.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would not the member calling up the bill be recognized for that purpose immediately after objections had been called for, so that upon the reading of the report the previous question might at once operate?

The SPEAKER. The House, if it so wishes, can cut off amendment by the operation of the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then the member controlling the bill has the right to move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Of course; but if the House should not sustain the demand, the bill would be open to amendments; as the Chair has stated in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS.]

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to make a further inquiry. Does the Chair decide that after an amendment is offered the right of objection applies to the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not so decided.

Mr. ATKINS. Then the rule is a farce.

The SPEAKER. It may be a farce; but the House adopted it.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to give notice that unless that be the decision, I shall object (and I have no doubt a sufficient number of others will join with me in objecting) to the bringing up of any bill that can by any possibility be amended so as to present to the House a substantially different proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is quite willing at any time to submit to the House any question as to the construction of this rule, as he did yesterday; and the Chair will hold himself absolutely bound by the decision of the House, even though it may differ from his own judgment.

The question recurring on ordering the main question upon the passage of the bill, the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. BOWMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DAVID W. BELL.

The SPEAKER. The next State is the State of Michigan; and the first gentleman in alphabetical order is Mr. BREWER.

Mr. STONE. In the absence of my colleague [Mr. BREWER] I call up——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that in the absence of the member called (although this rule may in some cases operate as a hardship, as the gentleman from Georgia explained this morning it did in his case) the rule would require that the Chair should pass to the next member in alphabetical order. The gentleman from Michigan, Mr. BURROWS, is next in order.

Mr. BURROWS. I yield to my colleague [Mr. STONE] that he may call up his bill.

The SPEAKER. No yielding is necessary. The gentleman will be considered as calling up the bill in his own right. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 5832) for the relief of David W. Bell.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the proper accounting officer of the Post-Office Department is hereby authorized and directed to credit David W. Bell, postmaster at Oxford, Michigan, with the sum of $363.68 in his account as postmaster as aforesaid with said Department; said sum being the amount of postal money and postage-stamps stolen from said post-office on the night of the 23d of March, 1880.

The SPEAKER. This bill has been reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The question is on discharging the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill and passing it at this time. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WARNER. Let the report be read.

Mr. BURROWS. My colleague [Mr. STONE] reported it, and I yield to him.

Mr. STONE. It has been some months, in fact a year, since I made the report. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and I ask the Clerk to read it. It is a case of burglary of a post-office.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5832) for the relief of David W. Bell, would respectfully report:

That the said David W. Bell is now, and has been for a number of years past, the postmaster at Oxford, Oakland County, Michigan. He is also the township treasurer of his township, and the agent of the American Express Company at that place. The post-office is kept in the store of the said Bell, as is also the express office. The funds of the township, of the post-office, and also money and valuables held by Mr. Bell as express agent, were kept in an iron safe furnished him by said express company, supposed to be burglar-proof, and weighing about eighteen hundred pounds. This safe was kept in the store and post-office.

It is clearly established by competent evidence, and your committee find, that on the night of the 23d day of March, 1880, the store building containing the post-office was entered by burglars through the back door. The thieves effected an entrance by breaking a glass in the upper part of the door, and unlocking the door with the key which was in the lock on the inside, and had free access to the inside of the building. The safe containing postage-stamps, postal and other funds, was locked. The burglars drilled into the safe just below the combination, charged it with powder, and blew the door open and stole the contents. Besides $2,520 belonging to the township and express company and others, there were also in the safe, and stolen, $200 of postal funds, and postage-stamps amounting to $163.68, making a total of postal funds and stamps stolen $363.68.

There was no person sleeping in the store, but as the safe had been used for a number of years and was considered secure, we attach no blame to the postmaster.

Your committee, being satisfied that this loss occurred as above stated, and through no fault, negligence, or connivance of the postmaster, recommend the passage of the bill, believing it to be a case in which the postmaster should be relieved.

We append, as a part of this report, a copy of the letter of the special agent of the Post-Office Department who investigated the case; also a statement from the Post-Office Department showing the probable amount of postage-stamps, &c., on hand at the time of the burglary.

CHICAGO, May 6, 1880.

SIR: I herewith return case No. 43045 B, pertaining to the robbery of the post-office at Oxford, Oakland County, Michigan.

According to your instructions, I proceeded at once to Oxford, Michigan, and investigated the robbery of the post-office at that place thoroughly. I found, upon a careful investigation, the following facts:

That between the hours of two and three o'clock on the morning of the 24th day of March, 1880, the post-office at Oxford, Michigan, was entered by thieves through the back door in which the post-office was located. The door having a window in the top part, the thieves broke a glass in window. The key being left in the lock on the inside of the door, they reached in, unlocked the door, and had free access to inside of the building back of the boxes. The postmaster had, in this part of the office, a safe sent him by the American Express Company (he being their agent at this place) for the safe-keeping of their money and other valuables. In this safe the postmaster kept postage-stamps, money-order funds, box and stamp funds, and the books belonging to the office. These were all in the safe at the time of the robbery. This safe was thought to be burglar-proof, but was drilled into just below the combination, charged with powder, and door blown open.

The postmaster, being very much excited when he found that he had been robbed, forgot to count the stamps left in office, and therefore cannot give an exact account of the loss.

| Amount of postage-stamps taken, as stated by the postmaster | $163 68 |
| Amount of money-order funds taken | 200 00 |
| Total amount of loss | 363 68 |

Finding from the best citizens of Oxford, Michigan, that the postmaster at that place is an honest, upright, and very careful business man, and that all has been done and will be done in his power to ascertain the whereabouts of the thieves, I therefore recommend that no blame be attached to the postmaster.

Very respectfully,

G. W. PORTER,
Special Agent Post-Office Department.

Captain J. E. STUART,
Special Agent Post-Office Department, Chicago, Illinois.

OXFORD, MICHIGAN, D. W. BELL, POSTMASTER.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill at this time? No member rises to object, and the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar is discharged from its further consideration, and it is before the House at this time for action.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STONE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM BLAISDELL.

The State of Minnesota was called.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 7030) regulating the pension of William Blaisdell, and that the bill be passed.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Blaisdell, late of Company F, Fifth Regiment Minnesota Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month from the 4th day of June, 1872, deducting therefrom any sums that may have heretofore been paid him since said date under any pension certificate issued to him.

The report was read, as follows:

It appears that William Blaisdell was enlisted as a private in Company F, Fifth Regiment Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, on January 24, 1862, and discharged therefrom September 6, 1865.

Claimant alleges that he contracted sciatic rheumatism and kidney troubles during his term of service, and soon after the war he applied for and was granted pension at the rate of $2 per month, which was subsequently increased at various times and to various amounts till May 4, 1880, when he was placed on the pension-roll at the rate of $24 per month.

The claimant asks Congress to correct the unjust rating and grant him a pension at said rate from the date of his application for pension filed September 26, 1868.

That claimant suffered with the above-mentioned diseases is clear from the evidence and from the fact that he was pensioned therefor; that he is now in a deplorable state is equally clear.

The testimony further discloses the fact that the examining surgeon—one Everheart—was at enmity with claimant and prejudiced against him. Other surgeons report his case as deserving higher rate.

Dr. R. Wilson states that he attended claimant in 1868 and 1869; that he was then suffering from sciatica and unable to perform but the slightest labor.

Dr. L. F. Cose states that he treated claimant in 1873-'74-'75, and that he had not been able to perform any labor since 1865.

Dr. E. M. Moorehouse states that he knew claimant before the war; that he was then sound and healthy, and that he treated him for sciatic rheumatism in 1866, and that he was then totally unable to perform manual labor.

The committee are of opinion that the relief sought ought to be granted, and report to the House the accompanying substitute for the bill, and recommend its passage.

There was no objection; and the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was discharged from its further consideration.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

The State of Mississippi was called.

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time Senate bill No. 711, amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the seventh section of the act entitled "An act amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, as authorizes the selection and appointment of three commissioners, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to appoint the Comptroller of the Currency a commissioner, who shall execute a bond to the United States, with good securities, in the penal sum of $20,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties aforesaid, and take an oath faithfully to perform his duties, which bond shall be executed in the presence of said Secretary and approved by him, and by him safely kept; and when said bond shall have been executed, and oath taken, then said commissioner shall be invested with the possession and legal title to all the property of said company for the purposes of this act and the said act of June 20, 1874, and shall have all the rights, prerogatives, and privileges, and perform all the duties that were conferred and enjoined upon the three commissioners in said act of June 20, 1874; and from and after the qualification of said Comptroller as said commissioner the duties, rights, and authority of said three commissioners shall forthwith cease and determine: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall in any way impede or delay any case or cases instituted in any court by or against the commissioners appointed under the provisions of the act to which this act is amendatory, but every such case shall, upon suggestion of the appointment of the Comptroller aforesaid, and due entry of the change on the docket of the court in which said case may be pending, be proceeded with in the name of such Comptroller in the same manner as if such change had not been made.

SEC. 3. That said commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have the right and authority to compound and compromise debts due to and liabilities of the company.

SEC. 4. That said commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have the right and authority to sell any of the real and personal property of said company at public or private sale, as in his judgment he may deem best, and to buy in for the benefit of the company any property which may be offered for sale to pay debts and liabilities to said company, if in his judgment said property is being sacrificed by said sale, and to make to the purchasers of property sold by him deeds of conveyance for their respective purchases.

SEC. 5. That said commissioner shall, by the 10th day of each annual session of Congress, make a written report to Congress of his proceedings up to the first day of said session; and for his service as commissioner aforesaid, he shall, in addition to his present salary as Comptroller, receive an annual salary of $1,000, to be paid out of the funds of said institution.

SEC. 6. That whenever said commissioner is prepared to make a dividend to the depositors, he is authorized and directed through the United States Treasurer to place in the various depository banks of the United States which are convenient to said depositors an amount sufficient to pay them, and the officers of said banks shall pay the depositors or their assignees, and take receipts from them in such way and manner as shall be prescribed by said commissioner and the Secretary of the Treasury; and said evidences of payment shall be returned by said officers to the commissioner, and by him preserved: Provided, That where there are no depository banks of the United States, then said commissioner may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, pay the depositors in said localities in such way as he may deem best.

SEC. 7. That said commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe such form as he may deem right and proper for the depositors to transfer their claims: Provided, Every such transfer shall state the amount of the claim transferred, and the amount actually received for the same.

SEC. 8. That said commissioner shall make payments to those depositors only whose pass-books have been properly verified and balanced, unless said pass-books have been lost or destroyed; then, upon satisfactory proof of such loss or destruction, and the amount due them, he may pay as though they had pass-books. But all claims founded on pass-books or otherwise not presented to said commissioner for examination and credit within six months from and after the passage of this act, as well as all dividends declared upon audited accounts not called for within two years from the date of their declaration, shall be barred, and their amounts shall inure to the benefit of the other depositors of the company.

SEC. 9. That it shall be the duty of the solicitor of the Treasury, under the direction of said commissioner, to investigate the manner in which said company has been managed by its trustees and others having control thereof; and if, in the judgment of said solicitor, the affairs of said company have been mismanaged, or managed fraudulently and corruptly, then said solicitor, under the direction of said commissioner, shall cause such civil and criminal proceedings to be instituted in the courts against those participating in said mismanagement or fraudulent and corrupt management as he shall deem right and proper to attain the ends of justice. He shall pay fees and costs of suits out of the funds in his hands as commissioner aforesaid; and said solicitor shall attend to all the suits in the courts held in the District of Columbia in which such company is in any manner a party, and he shall be the legal adviser of such commissioner in all matters in which such company is interested.

SEC. 10. That if from any cause there shall be any considerable delay in making a dividend to the depositors, then said commissioner shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, invest the funds on hand in United States bonds, until such time as he may be prepared to make a dividend, as directed under the act of June 20, 1874.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is taken from the Speaker's table and is now before the House for consideration.

Mr. CLYMER. Let the report be read.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That will consume a great deal of time, and I will state for the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as well as for the other members of the House, that I had the honor at the last session of this Congress to introduce a joint resolution of similar tenor and substance to the Senate bill now under consideration.

This resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and was unanimously reported back favorably to the House by the chairman of that committee. The whole subject under consideration is in a nut-shell. The bill abolishes the commission of the three commissioners appointed under the act of 1874, who in six years have consumed in expenses and charges over three hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars of the savings deposits of the freedmen, paying to themselves each the sum of $3,000 per annum, when one commissioner did the whole work of the three. The bill stops this waste and provides for an officer of the Treasury closing up at once the institution and distributing the proceeds of its assets and property among the needy depositors. That is all there is in the bill beyond certain details in consummating the close of the institution, and the bill should be passed at once and without dissent.

Several MEMBERS. What committee reported it in the Senate?

Mr. O'CONNOR. It came from the special committee in the Senate on the Freedman's Saving and Trust Company, of which Senator BRUCE was chairman. I now move that the bill be put upon its passage.

The Senate bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CHALMERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALE OF LEAF-TOBACCO WITHOUT SPECIAL TAX.

The State of Missouri was called.

Mr. BLAND. I ask that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 933) to repeal so much of the sixth clause of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as prohibits farmers and planters from selling leaf-tobacco at retail directly to consumers without the payment of a special tax, and to allow farmers and planters to sell leaf-tobacco of their own production to other persons than manufacturers of tobacco without special tax, and that it be put upon its passage at this time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That all of that portion of the sixth clause of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes of the United States embraced in the following words: "Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to exempt from a special tax any farmer or planter who, by peddling or otherwise, sells leaf-tobacco at retail directly to consumers, or who sells or assigns, consigns, transfers, or disposes of, to persons other than those who have paid a special tax as leaf-dealers or manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, or to persons purchasing leaf-tobacco for export," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That no farmer or planter shall be required to pay a special tax as a dealer in leaf-tobacco for selling tobacco of his own production or tobacco received by him as rent from tenants who have produced the same on his land; and they may sell the same to persons other than those who have paid a special tax as leaf-dealers or manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, or to persons purchasing leaf-tobacco for export.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. FRYE. Before objection is asked I should like to inquire what committee this bill comes from, and whether it is upon the Calendar?

Mr. BLAND. It comes from the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. FRYE. Is there a report accompanying it?

Mr. HATCH. There is no report. It was reported before the new rules went into effect.

Mr. CAMP. Objections have not been asked for to the consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. BLAND. If there is objection to it, gentlemen should be counted, as I should like to know who they are.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen have risen, among them the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, [laughter,] more than enough to defeat the consideration of the bill.

SOLDIERS' REUNION, LINCOLN, NEBRASKA.

The State of Nebraska being called,

Mr. VALENTINE asked the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 152.

The SPEAKER. The title of the resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to grant the use of artillery, tents, &c., to be used at the soldiers' reunion to be held at Lincoln, Nebraska, in September, 1881.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The resolution was read. It is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to send, from some convenient fort or arsenal, to be used at the soldiers' reunion at Lincoln, Nebraska, to be held in the month of September, 1881, such cannon, tents, muskets, &c., as can be conveniently spared; said cannon, tents, muskets, &c., to be returned after the holding of said reunion meeting in as like good condition as when received: Provided, That all transportation of said articles to and from the place of the reunion to the fort or arsenal shall be without expense to the Government: Provided further, That the adjutant-general of the State of Nebraska, or other proper accounting officer, shall receipt for said arms, ammunition, and camp equipage, in the name of said State, and that such of them as shall not be returned shall be charged to said State against its quota.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of a Senate resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VALENTINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN M. DORSEY AND WILLIAM F. SHEPARD.

The State of Nevada being called,

Mr. DAGGETT asked the consideration of Senate bill No. 212.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read; after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 212) for the relief of John M. Dorsey and William F. Shepard.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Private Calendar, and reported from the Committee on Claims. Is there objection to its present consideration? [After a pause.] Several members having objected, the bill is not before the House for consideration.

PETER GROTTAN.

The State of New Hampshire being called,

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIGGS] not being in his seat, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALL,] under the decision of the House made yesterday.

Mr. HALL. I ask consideration of House bill No. 1830.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 1830) granting a pension to Peter Grottan.

The SPEAKER. This bill comes from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and is on the Private Calendar. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLYMER. Let the report be read.

Mr. HALL. I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that there is a typographical error in the title of the bill as also in the body of it. It should be "Grattan" in place of "Grottan."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the amendment after the report is read. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the reading of the report.

Mr. HALL. I wish to say that this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. CLYMER. Then I withdraw the demand for the reading of the report if it is a unanimous report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to correct the typographical error in the bill by substituting "a" for "o" in the name of the beneficiary of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be changed to conform to the amendments made by the House in the body of the bill.

TAX ON WEISS BEER.

The State of New Jersey being called,

Mr. BLAKE asked the consideration of House bill No. 6983.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to regulate the collection of the tax on weiss beer.

Mr. CARLISLE. This bill was reported this morning from the Committee on Ways and Means with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the amendment will be read.

The bill was read. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That brewers of weiss beer may bottle that liquor upon the premises where the same is brewed or made, in bottles containing not more than one pint or one quart each, and such bottled liquor may be removed from the brewery for consumption or sale, and upon payment of the tax, in boxes containing each either two dozen pint bottles or one dozen or two dozen quart bottles, and not otherwise. The stamps provided by this act shall be affixed to the boxes when sold or removed from the brewery in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may by regulation prescribe; and such boxes, in addition to the other brands now required by law upon packages containing fermented liquors, shall be branded upon the side, in letters not less than one inch in length, with the words "weiss beer." Brewers of weiss beer shall also enter in the book required by law to be kept, and in the monthly statement made to the collector, in addition to the entries now by law required, the actual quantity of such liquors sold or removed for consumption or sale in bottles, specifying the number and size of such bottles.

SEC. 2. That there shall be paid hereafter on weiss beer, brewed or manufactured, and sold or removed for consumption or sale in bottles, within the United States, in lieu of the tax of $1 for every barrel containing not more than thirty-one gallons, a tax of three cents per gallon, without any allowance or deduction whatever. For the payment of the tax the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause to be prepared suitable stamps denoting the tax required to be paid on two dozen pints and on one dozen or two dozen quarts of such liquor, respectively; and the same shall be furnished to collectors of internal revenue, and sold and accounted for, as is now provided by law respecting other stamps for fermented liquors.

SEC. 3. That whenever any stamped box containing bottles of weiss beer is emptied, it shall be the duty of the person in whose hands the same is to utterly destroy the stamp or stamps thereon; and any person who neglects or refuses to do so shall, for each such offense, be fined $100 and imprisoned for not more than one year. And any person who gives away or accepts from another, or who sells, or buys, or uses, for holding bottles of weiss beer, any such stamped box shall, for each such offense, be fined $100 and imprisoned not more than one year. And any wagon, cart, or conveyance, and its contents, and all horses or other animals, and all things used in the conveyance of such a stamped box which has been emptied of its contents without the stamp thereon being utterly destroyed, shall be forfeited to the United States.

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after line 12 down to and including the words "weiss beer," in line 16, and insert "and such box shall have printed upon the side in letters not less than one inch in length——

Mr. WARNER. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the hour has expired. The time for making objections has passed. This is a long bill and should have careful consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The time has expired. The bill will go over. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] sought the floor to ask unanimous consent, and will now be recognized.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now repeat my request for unanimous consent.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the regular order by making the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me that I may make a statement?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. I was absent yesterday by leave of the House engaged in the preparation of the sundry civil bill when my name was reached in the call under the new rule. I was in a mistake as to the time and did not get here so as to avail myself of the privilege. I ask that under the circumstances I be allowed to call up a bill for present consideration.

Mr. STEPHENS. It will not take more than five minutes.

Mr. VALENTINE. I have no desire to object to the consideration of the bill of the gentleman from Georgia. But I would like to ask unanimous consent that the same privilege be extended to the gentleman from Colorado who is absent at this moment, and who was necessarily absent yesterday when his State was called.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WHITE. What is the bill called up by the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is a bill for the relief of W. A. Reid. It is a unanimous report of the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] asks unanimous consent that the same privilege be granted to the gentleman from Colorado, [Mr. BELFORD.]

Mr. McMILLIN. Before agreeing to that we want to know what bills are to be called up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] objects. The bill which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] asks unanimous consent to have considered at this time will be read.

W. A. REID.

Mr. BLOUNT. I send the bill to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 1996) for the relief of W. A. Reid.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to W. A. Reid, of Eatonton, Georgia, the sum of $194.50, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for advertising done for the Government in 1867, by direction of the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill at this time?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Two days ago when I was endeavoring to pass a bill that required an appropriation, as was alleged, of Government property, the point of order was strenuously insisted on by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] that it must first be discussed in Committee of the Whole. I desire to know whether that point of order has yet been decided by the Chair? I do not object to the bill of the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided that point of order on yesterday. This is not under that call at all. This is a request for unanimous consent, outside of that rule altogether.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. That would not affect the rule which requires a bill making an appropriation of money or property to go to the Committee of the Whole. I do not insist, however, on the point of order. I wish the gentleman from Georgia to have an opportunity to pass his bill.

The SPEAKER. This is not a bill under the new rule as to the morning hour.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The same rule should apply to all.

Mr. WHITE. Do I understand the gentleman from Georgia is seeking to pass a bill under a different rule——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has asked unanimous consent that this bill be considered.

Mr. WHITE. I ask the Chair to hear my question. It is: If the gentleman from Georgia is seeking to pass a bill outside of the morning hour by a different rule from that to which it would be subject if it were called up under the new rule?

The SPEAKER. The bill the gentleman is now seeking to pass only requires under the rules a single objection to prevent its consideration. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WHITE. I should like all to be subject to the same rules.

Mr. ATHERTON. Was not a bill called up yesterday by another gentleman from Georgia?

The SPEAKER. That was under a construction which the House made of the rule.

Mr. ATHERTON. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] be recognized, then two gentlemen from that State will have had that privilege.

The SPEAKER. Only one in the call under the new rule. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which has been read?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ELAM. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. McMILLIN. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman will allow me to make one or two motions to expedite the public business.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee for that purpose.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask that the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, with amendments by the Senate, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that the Senate amendments be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ARCTIC EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

Mr. ATKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, under an order of the House, to report back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 7156) appropriating money to be used under the direction of the Navy Department to prosecute a search for the steamer Jeannette, of the arctic exploring expedition.

Mr. KEIFER. Let that bill be considered now.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I hope it will be passed. It will take no time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I object to its present consideration.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 201) for the relief of Somerville Nicholson;

A bill (S. No. 1191) for the relief of James Monroe Heiskell, of Baltimore City, Maryland; and

A bill (S. No. 1193) granting a pension to Milton L. Sparr.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illnois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 1487) to restore the lands included in the Fort Reading and Fort Crook military reservations, in the State of California, to the public domain, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 799) granting a pension to Richard P. Taylor;

A bill (H. R. No. 859) granting a pension to William H. Scribner;

A bill (H. R. No. 1107) granting a pension to Mrs. Elisabeth Upright;

A bill (H. R. No. 1628) granting a pension to Dalton Hinchman;

A bill (H. R. No. 1953) for the relief of Henry C. Groomes;

A bill (H. R. No. 2044) granting a pension to Martha J. Porter;

A bill (H. R. No. 2548) granting a pension to Martha Neil;

A bill (H. R. No. 3098) granting a pension to Jacob Ginder;

A bill (H. R. No. 3487) granting a pension to James Forsyth Harrison; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6451) to amend and re-enact sections 2517 and 2518 of the Revised Statutes, and changing the boundaries of a customs district in the State of Maine.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks consent to lay before the House sundry executive communications, that they may be promptly referred to their appropriate committees.

There was no objection.

STATISTICAL ABSTRACT.

The SPEAKER accordingly laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the third number of the Statistical Abstract of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM IN ARIZONA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting papers in the Arizona private land claim "Aribac;" which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

EASTERN CHEROKEES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relating to the desire of the eastern band of Cherokees for assistance to enable them to join their brethren in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MARINE HOSPITAL, WILMINGTON, NORTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to the marine hospital building at Wilmington, North Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REGISTRATION OF TRADE-MARKS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Patents relative to the registration of trade-marks; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

FORCE IN PENSION OFFICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Pensions relative to the condition of the working force in his office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

NAVIGATION AT THE HEAD OF LAKE SUPERIOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on the wants of navigation at the head of Lake Superior; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CONSULAR REPORTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, relative to an appropriation for printing consular reports; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CLAIMS OF REVOLUTIONARY LINE OFFICERS.

Mr. SIMONTON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 4480) to provide for the settlement of the unpaid claims of those officers of the line of the Revolutionary army who served to the close of the war of Independence, and were so returned on the books of the Treasury; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT, BURLINGTON, IOWA.

Mr. VOORHIS. I am instructed unanimously by the Committee on Private Land Claims to report to the House, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 4206) confirming and vesting the title to a certain tract of land in Burlington, Iowa, "in the independent school district" of said city. It is merely to correct a verbal error in one of the statutes, and I ask that it be now considered.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. REAGAN. I have no objection if it will not lead to debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that it is merely to correct a clerical error.

Mr. McCOID. That is all.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it is claimed that the word "west," after the words "Valley street," in the "act confirming the title to a tract of land in the city of Burlington, Iowa," approved July 4, 1868, (volume 15, page 82, United States Statutes at Large,) is a clerical error, and that the word "east" should be inserted in lieu thereof: Therefore, in order to properly confirm the title to the lot which was intended to be confirmed by such act,

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act confirming the title to a tract of land in Burlington, Iowa," approved July 4, 1868, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows: That all of the title of the United States in and to a certain tract of land in the city of Burlington, Des Moines County, in the State of Iowa, described as being west of lot No. 978 in said city, south of Valley street, east of Ninth street, and north of Market street, as laid down on the plat of said city certified under the act of Congress of March 3, 1837, by William W. Connell and George Cubbage, commissioners, and now on file in the General Land Office, and which was originally reserved from sale by the United States and dedicated to public burial purposes, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to and vested in the "independent school district" of said city, to be forever dedicated to and used by said school district for public-school purposes, and for no other purpose whatsoever.

There was no objection, and the bill was before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment reported from the committee.

The amendment was, in line 10 of the printed bill to strike out the word "Ninth" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Boundary;" so that it will read: "East of Boundary street and north of Market street."

Mr. McCOID. That is to make this bill conform in language with the original act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITE. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committtee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

HON. RANDALL L. GIBSON.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report on the petition of Hon. Randall L. Gibson to be allowed for his expenses in an election contest in the Forty-third Congress; which report was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. JOYCE.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHITE. I call for the regular order now.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Texas, to go into Committee of the Whole on the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Before the question is taken on that motion, I desire to move that all general debate upon that bill in Committee of the Whole be closed in thirty-five minutes. I will state that it is my intention to give fifteen minutes of that time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RUSSELL,] a member of the Committee on Commerce, and fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON,] a member of the Committee on Commerce, reserving five minutes to myself to close general debate.

Mr. ACKLEN. I ask the gentleman to make the time one hour.

Mr. REAGAN. I would be glad to accommodate my friend, but I am acting under instructions of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ACKLEN. I desire to say that although there was, as I understand, a meeting of the Committee on Commerce this morning, it was not the day for the regular meeting of that committee, and I was not advised that there would be any such meeting. On Thursday last, when this bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole, the then occupant of the chair, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] expected to recognize me to address the committee, and I yielded to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] for a motion that the committee rise, expecting that when the subject was again resumed I would have a few minutes at least to explain my views upon this bill. The effect of limiting debate to thirty-five minutes will be to cut me off from any opportunity to speak.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Texas to limit general debate on the river and harbor appropriation bill to thirty-five minutes.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move to amend that motion so as to limit general debate to four hours. There are a great many members here who want to say a word on this bill.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. VAN VOORHIS to limit general debate to four hours, it was not agreed to.

Mr. ACKLEN. I move an amendment to limit debate to three-quarters of an hour. That is but ten minutes in excess of the time indicated by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. It is understood that after general debate is closed, which I hope will be in thirty-five minutes, the bill will then be considered by paragraphs, and there will be an opportunity for every member desiring to be heard to make a five-minute speech.

The amendment of Mr. ACKLEN was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. REAGAN, that general debate in Committee of the Whole on the river and harbor bill be limited to thirty-five minutes, it was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. REAGAN, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate on this bill has been limited to thirty-five minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RUSSELL.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] who, by reservation made the other day without objection, has thirty-five minutes remaining, yields to the gentleman from Massachusetts for fifteen minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the opposition so far developed against the passage of the river and harbor bill reported to the House by the Committee on Commerce and called up for consideration by Mr. REAGAN on Monday, under the suspension of the rules, is based on the following reasons:

First. That a bill of this character and magnitude should be first considered in the Committee of the Whole, where each item can be discussed and subject to amendment.

Second. That the committee had not equitably distributed the appropriations territorially.

Third. That the stipulation in regard to the appropriation for the improvement of the Lower Mississippi "in accordance with the plan therefor adopted by the Mississippi River commission, to be expended by the Secretary of War, with the advice and under the supervision of said commission, the sum of $1,000,000; and it shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and of the Secretary of War to extend operations under their supervision to tributaries of the Mississippi River to the extent, and no further, that may be necessary in the judgment of said commission to the perfection of the general and permanent improvement of said Mississippi River," is not sufficiently guarded to prevent the use of this appropriation to build up the levees for the protection of the alluvial lands lying along the Mississippi River.

In answer to the first objection I wish here to state in behalf of the Committee on Commerce that we have obeyed the instructions of the House in formulating this bill in committee, and it was called up on Monday for consideration and action under the suspension of the rules by Mr. REAGAN, a member of the committee, in conformity to a custom which seemed well established by the action of the past six or seven Congresses. Formerly when the bill was considered in the Committee of the Whole and subjected to amendment it never grew smaller, and that the amendments urgently and eloquently presented and adopted always increased the bill and generally to such proportions that it failed altogether.

In answer to the second objection, that the appropriations in the bill are not equitably distributed among the States, the committee affirm that they have by a long and careful consideration of the merits and demands of each item in the bill faithfully and conscientiously recommended appropriations which in their judgment the merits and necessities of the work demanded. The reports and recommendations of the Engineer Department which has these works in charge have necessarily been to a great extent our guide. These reports give the character and probable cost of the works, and show to what extent the improvement may facilitate commerce.

The charge that certain States or particular works in the States had been favored without reference to the necessity of the improvement is unjust and without foundation in fact. Texas, which has been referred to, has large appropriations in the bill, but has not received a larger proportion to the amount recommended by the Engineer Department for the works going on in that great State than other States have received; no more than the State of California, though the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] complains that the Pacific coast has not received fair consideration at the hands of the committee.

I commend to the consideration of this House the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] whose inland State receives very little in this bill, but he, having served on the Committee on Commerce, has, through familiarity with the needs of commerce, been led to support the bill making liberal appropriations for the improvement of our navigable waters.

The committee have, with such light as they had before them, and with a due regard to the size of the bill, dealt justly with every section of the country.

Another feature of the objections which develop under this head and which has been presented by members on this floor is, that their States had better make their own improvements to their rivers and harbors (in view of what they get in this bill and the population of the State) rather than share in the general bill. This is a narrow and limited view to take of the question of river and harbor improvement. But a sufficient answer to this suggestion is in the fact that all the navigable waters belong to and are under the control of the United States.

What we want in this country is cheap transportation, the very best facilities for handling and transporting from point to point the products of field, forest, mines, and our manufactures; and while we live and have gained and enjoy so high a state of civilization through the system of an exchange of commodities, you cannot improve transportation in one section of the country without its being felt equally in every other section. It is the strength and beauty of this country that we have a diversified soil and climate, each section producing commodities peculiar to itself; and while the cotton from the fields of the South can be more cheaply transported to the seaboard over the long and narrow rivers which traverse the low lands of that section by the removal of stumps and overhanging trees, it may be, (improvements so much criticised in the House,) the benefit is not alone to the cotton-grower nor to the cotton-spinner in our great manufacturing cities, Lowell, Lawrence, and Fall River, but to every person who uses manufactures of cotton. The coal-miners who can more cheaply transport their products over the improved rivers that flow through the coal-mining regions are not alone benefited, but the consumers of that indispensable commodity also, wherever they may be.

The improvement of the rivers and lakes for the transportation of lumber and the cereals of the great West affords no local advantages that are not felt in the remotest part of our country. The cost of transportation from the wheat-fields of the West to the consumers in the East and South is an important item in the cost of our breadstuffs, and whatever can be saved by superior facilities in transportation is a gain both to the producer and consumer.

There are three great forces which underlie and constitute our success and which are essential to the permanent prosperity of any country, namely: First, fertility of soil; second, the industry and ingenuity of the people to take advantage of what nature affords them; third, and not the least important, cheap transportation. The first we have, for no country has a more fruitful soil, and our people are industrious and ingenious.

They lead all nations in fashioning implements for agriculture and machinery for manufactures. And now, what have we done and what can we do in the interest of cheap transportation? In the early settlement of the country and until a very recent date we have been obliged for the want of sufficient capital to build our railroads on a cheap and unsubstantial basis. Iron rails, cheap road-beds, and light motive power, together with local and conflicting managements of short lines of railway, though links in a great chain reaching from the North to the South and from the East to the West, did not afford facilities for cheap transportation. But within the last few years great advances have been made in land transportation. Steel rails have been substituted for iron, the road-beds have been improved and greater motive power used; large engines of fifty tons weight having been substituted for those of thirty tons. Through connections have been so perfected that merchandise is now transported from one section of the country to the other over our railroads for one-half what it cost seven or eight years ago. And while this change has been going on by land like improvements of no less importance are going on in water transportation. The ships of 1,000 and 2,000 tons burden, which were of the largest class a few years ago, are now yielding to the larger ships of 4,000 and 5,000 tons burden; and what the improvement of the railroads has done for the land carriage of the country the large ships have done for the ocean and river carrying trade, so that the freight rates from point to point on our own coast and from our ports to foreign ports are reduced nearly one-half; and shall Congress now hesitate to follow the example of private enterprise among our own people on the one side and foreign nations on the other in improving our national water-ways so as to facilitate the union of these instrumentalities in the cheapening of freight transportation? Our harbors and rivers are certainly inadequate now for this purpose and ships are constantly increasing in size, and the sum proposed in this bill will not, spread upon the total inland and foreign tonnage carried on within our borders, amount to one cent per ton; and who can doubt that we shall reap a tenfold advantage to our people in cheapening transportation by this expenditure? This sum seems a paltry one for the repair of old and the opening of new water-ways when compared with the estimated expenditure of $400,000,000 annually for the repair of our railways.

I have learned through a somewhat extended business experience the truth of the saying, "Nothing ventured, nothing gained," and we must, to compete with our rivals, always on the alert, have the best of facilities in all departments of business. It is estimated that we pay to foreigners alone $100,000,000 annually for the transport of our exports and imports. I believe that we would save annually in transportation, on this item alone, brought about by the introduction of these large vehicles of transportation, which can only enter our harbors and great rivers by an expenditure by the Government to deepen their channels, more than is appropriated in this bill, to say nothing of the improvements upon our inland rivers and lakes and the building and repairing of our harbors of refuge, which serve the double purpose of saving life and property.

The third objection, which was raised by my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSH,] is that the appropriation for the improvement of the Lower Mississippi may be expended for building up the levees, and that consequently the alluvial lands lying alongside the river may be thereby improved.

The committee examined carefully the report of the commission, and also had the commission before them, and these gentlemen explained their plan of operations, which satisfied the committee that they would confine their experiments for the improvement of the navigation of the river to the system known as the jetty system, which has proved so successful at the mouth of the river at New Orleans.

I quote from the report of the commission under the head "Plan of improvement recommended:"

It would seem, therefore, that the plan of improvement must comprise, as its essential features, the contraction of the water-way of the river to a comparatively uniform width, and the protection of caving banks, and this is presumed to be the plan referred to in the act as the "jetty system." It is known, from observation of the river below Cairo, not only that shoals and bars, producing insufficient depth and bad navigation, are always accompanied by a low-water width exceeding three thousand feet, but that wherever the river does not exceed that width there is a good channel. In other words, bad navigation invariably accompanies a wide low-river water-way, and good navigation a narrow one.

The work to be done, therefore, is to scour out and maintain a channel through the shoals and bars existing in those portions of the river where the width is excessive, and to build up new banks and develop new shore-lines, so as to establish as far as practicable the requisite conditions of uniform velocity for all stages of the river.

It is believed that this improvement can be accomplished below Cairo by contracting the low-water channel-way to an approximately uniform width of about three thousand feet, for the purpose of scouring out a channel through the shoals and bars, and by causing, through the action of appropriate works constructed at suitable localities, the deposition of sand and other earthy materials transported by the water upon the dry bars and other portions of the present bed not embraced within the limits of the proposed low-water channel. The ultimate effect sought to be produced by such deposits is a comparative uniformity in the width of the high-water channel of the river.

It is believed that the works estimated for in this report will create and establish a depth of at least ten feet at extreme low stages of the river over all the bars below Cairo, where they are located.

It is the opinion of this commission that, as a general rule, the channel should be fixed and maintained in its present location, and that no attempt should be made to straighten the river or to shorten it by cut-offs.

There is no intimation by the report or the testimony of the commission that the War Department through the counsel of the commission will not carry out in good faith the proposition to improve the navigation of the river, and that only; and that no part of this appropriation would be used for the direct or indirect recovery of overflowed lands only so far as that result might follow the closing of gaps, which might be found necessary as an adjunct to the improvement of the navigation of the river. The committee believe that the language of the bill is sufficiently guarded to keep them within those limits, and that these gentlemen in calling the attention of Congress and the country to the provisions connected with this item in the bill have created an unnecessary alarm, for the plan adopted by the commission looks to the same auxiliary aid which my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] foreshadowed and promised to support if adopted. My colleague was a member of the committee which introduced a bill to form the commission. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an extract from his speech made at that time:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SPARKS. I understood the gentleman to say that he was in favor of the nine first sections of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Of the first nine sections.

Mr. SPARKS. Is the gentleman in favor of this portion of the fourth section of the bill, namely, "and for the protection of the alluvial lands of the Mississippi Delta from overflow from said river?"

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. My impression is either that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] has not been present while I have been addressing the committee, or that I have been singularly deficient in making myself understood.

Mr. SPARKS. That provision is in section 4. Are you in favor of that?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I will answer the gentleman. This bill is intended to provide a commission to devise a plan for the improvement of the Mississippi River and the protection of the alluvial lands combined. If, as a part of the whole plan for the improvement of the river for purposes of navigation and incidental thereto, the lands of that valley may be protected—I am in favor of it. But if the result of the work of the commission should be only a report for the protection or reclamation of the lands alone, then as I now stand, as I am at present advised, I could not advocate or vote for such a proposition.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I call attention to this to show that the committee of Congress who gave this matter considerable attention at the time and the gentleman himself fully believed that some of the gaps in the banks of the river would have to be closed as an adjunct to the new plan or jetty system proposed, and that he declared his readiness to vote appropriations which might incidentally reclaim land lying alongside the river if such work were necessary for the improvement of the navigation of the river.

But, Mr. Chairman, while the committee believe that the bill is properly guarded as it is, the immediate friends of the project and the committee are perfectly willing that this appropriation shall be so guarded as to satisfy the legal critics of this House and the country, and the committee now give notice that when this item is reached they will support any amendments that are offered in good faith to draw additional safeguards around this appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, there is clearly a majority of this House in favor of this bill, and I am sorry to see factious opposition developing to defeat its passage. There is now and then a man from the business walks of life who finds his way to a seat on this floor. He is not only struck with the facility with which the business of the country can be retarded under the rules, but disappointed to find that when a purely business measure is presented in this House which cannot be defeated by the ordinary tactics under the intricate rules of the House, members are ready to inject into the discussions partisan politics and sectionalism and deprive the country of the best judgment of its legislators. We saw that demonstrated in the passage of the funding bill. When that measure was brought into the House there was a difference of opinion on both sides of the House as to the rate of interest and the length of bonds for the new loan. But, sir, after a few days' discussion, political considerations gained control and influenced the action of the House, and in the final passage of the bill the lines were strictly drawn between the political parties.

If no better rules can be made to facilitate public business it would be well if we could eliminate from practical business questions political considerations. Very little business has been or will be transacted in the Forty-sixth Congress. There are more than a thousand private and public bills which have been considered by the committees of the House now on the Calendar, a great many of them meritorious, which, failing to be enacted into law, will do injustice to both public and private interests.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in reference to the further action of the House in regard to this bill that there are in it three hundred and fifty items of appropriation. If there is an attempt to amend many items in the bill, with the usual discussion, it will consume more time than there is left in this Congress. We hope, therefore, in the interest of the passage of the bill and the other public business demanding attention, that no amendments will be offered other than this I have referred to in connection with the appropriation for the improvement of the Lower Mississippi. There is not an appropriation in this bill for the improvement of any waters which have not first been surveyed by Government engineers and the surveys and estimates revised by the Chief of Engineers and indorsed by the Secretary of War.

While some of them are less meritorious than others, all will facilitate commerce. These works are in no sense local but national, and when fully understood will be supported by broad and liberal-minded men of the country. I am for liberal appropriations for internal improvements, and believe I should misrepresent my people should I not support this bill, which is in the direction of American progress and development. As to the power of Congress to appropriate money for internal improvements, I quote from one of our most able commentators, Judge Story, (volume 2, page 162:)

> So far as regards the right to appropriate money to internal improvements generally, the subject has already passed under review in considering the power to lay and collect taxes. The doctrine there contended for, which has been in a great measure borne out by the actual practice of the Government, is that Congress may appropriate money, not only to clear obstructions to navigable rivers; to improve harbors; to build breakwaters; to assist navigation; to erect forts, lighthouses, and piers; and for other purposes allied to some of the enumerated powers; but may also appropriate it in aid of canals, roads, and other institutions of a similar nature existing under State authority. The only limitations upon the power are those prescribed by the terms of the Constitution, that the objects shall be for the common defense or the general welfare of the Union. The true test is whether the object be of a local character and local use, or whether it be of general benefit to the States. If it be purely local, Congress cannot constitutionally appropriate money for the object. But if the benefit be general, it matters not whether in point of locality it be in one State or several; whether it be of large or of small extent; its nature and character determine the right, and Congress may appropriate money in aid of it, for it is then in a just sense for the general welfare.

Which shows the wisdom and forethought of the framers of our Constitution to provide for this class of important public improvements.

Mr. REAGAN. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen have addressed the committee in behalf of the tributaries of the Mississippi River. They have urged appropriations for the Ohio, for the Missouri, and for all the great rivers that form finally the Father of Waters. There are forty-three great rivers draining the continent from the Alleghanies to the Rocky Mountains emptying into this vast basin from Cairo to the mouth of the Mississippi River. It is, I would say to the gentlemen who speak for the Missouri River, but the continuation of that river, and if the magnitude of the two rivers had determined the appellation it should be called the Missouri River and not the Mississippi River from Cairo to its mouth.

I say, then, will no one here speak for the Mississippi? Since we purchased the territory embracing this river survey after survey has been made, report after report from the most learned, eminent, and scientific engineers of the country who have been appointed to ininvestigate the phenomena of this river have been made, and their recommendations will be found in the libraries and committee-rooms of Congress. The veteran and distinguished member from Virginia himself, who served upon the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River, told that committee that he himself, under orders of this Government, had given much time to the investigation of the phenomena that this river presents. In the Forty-fourth Congress, when I may say there was a reunion of the sections, the proposition was made for the formation of a commission to investigate and report upon that river.

It was again proposed in the Forty-fifth Congress, but failed in the Senate for want of time. Finally in the Forty-sixth Congress it became a law. The President of the United States, in obedience to that law, appointed the ablest engineers of the United States upon the commission, many of whom had rendered themselves illustrious in the service of the Government. He also appointed upon that commission Mr. Eads, whose success at the mouth of the Mississippi River entitles him to be regarded as one of the benefactors of mankind. That commission, Mr. Chairman, made an accurate and thorough report after an elaborate survey of the Mississippi River, and they have submitted their report to this House. That report was presented to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River. Nay, more than that, under the rules of this House the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River was instructed to visit the Mississippi River personally to look into the subject-matter of this report, in order that, by actual investigation and observation, they might verify the report of the commission. They came back and reported. Such men as Judge HARRIS of Massachusetts, Mr. PRESCOTT of New York, Mr. HUMPHREY of Wisconsin, and Mr. MYERS of Indiana. These gentlemen went there, examined the river for themselves, came back, and reported that the recommendations of that commission were useful, wise, and ought to be adopted. In addition to that, the report, under the rules of this House, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, because, under the revision of the rules, authority to consider this question was taken away from the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and intrusted to the Committee on Commerce. It was therefore brought before that committee. They summoned the members of the Mississippi River commission before them. They heard them. They questioned them. They became satisfied from their testimony that the report was correct and that it was entitled to consideration, and they brought in a bill to carry out in part the recommendations of that commission.

Mr. Chairman, I have no earthly objections to the placing of any safeguards that the House may choose to throw around this appropriation. I wish to say frankly to the committee that we do not propose to build a levee, dike, or jetty, or anything of any character whatever on the Mississippi River for the purpose of protecting the alluvial lands on the border of that stream. Not a dollar of the money is contemplated to be expended for that purpose. Not a dollar of this appropriation is to be used in the reclamation of the alluvial lands in the Mississippi bottoms. This bill stands upon the power given under the Constitution to Congress to regulate commerce between the States, and any limitation that the gentleman from Massachusetts, who has always given friendly assistance to this measure, any limitation, I say, that he may deem necessary or proper to throw around this appropriation will be cordially accepted and adopted by the Representatives of that section of the Union. Let me, then, gentlemen, disabuse your mind on that subject. This proposition is simply to improve the channel, the navigation, the commerce of the Father of Waters, embracing a coast line of over two thousand miles, from Cairo to its mouth.

In reference to the phenomena that this great stream presents, this inland sea, the engineers hitherto have been baffled and thwarted. They have united easily in recommendations for the improvement of harbors on our eastern borders, because the propositions were simple and the conditions few. They have united without difficulty in improving upland streams, because all the books they studied at West Point and all the teachings of the schools embraced the phenomena of upland or ordinary streams. But the Mississippi River cannot be so readily explained or understood. Where is there another Mississippi River? Where is there a river that forms its own bed flowing through a vast region of alluvial material? The phenomena are novel and difficult. We have had attention given by the ablest engineers of this Government to the investigation of these phenomena, and we have their report before us. That report has received the sanction of two great committees of this House, upon which are gentlemen of experience and high character and sound conservative views, biased by no sectional jealousy. Mr. Chairman, I delight to say in the presence of this committee that the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] if he opposes this item at all, is not actuated by a single sentiment of sectional feeling. I know him too well for that, and I say, therefore, that in support of the report of this commission I shall stand by him in any legitimate, wise, and prudent safeguard that he may propose to protect every dollar of this money which is to be expended for the improvement of the channel and navigation of this great river.

Why, gentlemen, do you know what the difficulties of that river are? Do you know that at many points below Cairo for three, four, and five months of every year there are only three and a half feet or four feet of water; that the great granary of the West is choked up; that the great vehicles of communication on that river are tied up for three, four, and five months of the year because of these vast "reaches," as the engineers call them, some of them forty miles long with only three and a half feet and four feet water?

Are you not willing to vote to remove these obstacles to the great granary of the West? Are you not willing to allow to the hard-working people of the great valley of the Mississippi some of the profits, the legitimate profits that they may achieve if they can only get cheap transportation? Are you not willing to sweeten the toil of the laboring-men who till that great valley from the Rocky Mountains to the Alleghanies? This is no local question; it is no sectional question. It is a question which embraces, in one aspect, the cause of humanity itself. It relieves the burdens upon the distressed people of Europe who are wanting bread and meat; and it will bring to the vigorous, industrious, and intelligent population living upon the tributaries of this great river cheaper transportation and, therefore, increased wealth.

I will not, Mr. Chairman, fatigue this committee by any extended remarks. I know, when I look in the faces of the intelligent gentlemen who sit before me, that, following in the footsteps of Calhoun and Gadsden and Guthrie and Clay and Benton and Douglas, they will appreciate the importance of doing something to remove the impediments to commerce on this the grandest feature of the American continent.

Mr. Chairman, I could wish that the gentleman who is President-elect might be here once more to raise his voice upon this floor in favor of the improvement of the Father of Waters. No man appreciated the necessity of that more than he did when the matter was here for discussion, insisting upon the establishment of this Mississippi River commission; and in his letter of acceptance he goes further and says not only the interests of commerce but the interests of agriculture require this improvement. He declared that the Government should devise measures not only to facilitate its commerce, but to prevent its being any longer in seasons of great floods a "terror" to the people dwelling upon its banks. These words have touched the hearts of many a man in his cabin on the banks of the Mississippi River.

It must be remembered that every acre tilled and drained in the valley, that every stream opened and improved, precipitates in the aggregate an enormous flood upon the basin into which pour the waterfalls from the Rocky Mountains to the Allegheny. The engineers declare that the outlet theory would prove ruinous to the river. It does appear to be against common sense to propose to improve the river by taking all the water out of it. It will be clear to every one who shall examine carefully the surveys and remarks of the commission that the difficulties and impediments of the low-water navigation arise mainly from the vast floods that overflow the banks and fill the channel with sand-bars as they decline. It is the conviction of the commission that in order to improve the channel in low water, prevent the formation of these "reaches," at all seasons the water must be confined to its channel, that the increased velocity would diminish deposit and scour away the sand-bars. But we do not ask for levees or dikes or anything except such methods and plans as will improve the channel and navigation of the river. We are willing to leave these questions, the instrumentalities, to the engineers.

I am here to-day to speak in favor of the commerce of the Mississippi River. I am here to speak in favor of cheapening transportation to the people dwelling in the great valley. The district I have the honor to represent, and that has been so constant to me, may be called the jetty district, for we hold the gateway to the sea, and I hope my voice in behalf of the millions in the valley may find a responsive echo in the hearts of the inhabitants of the great Northwest and of their honored Representatives upon this floor.

It was a consolation to Sir Robert Peel when the corn laws were repealed and he was so harshly condemned by the great landed proprietors of England that he had cheapened the bread and sweetened the toil of the laboring people of England. I tell the Representatives here assembled that those who shall come forward to the support of this measure, destined to bring peace and comfort and security and blessings to the people of the Mississippi Valley, will long be remembered by them with grateful hearts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has six minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. The gentleman from Louisiana has yielded to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana had but fifteen minutes allowed him by the gentleman from Texas, and he has consumed fourteen minutes.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Then I have but one minute. I yield that minute to the gentleman from Texas, who has occupied so little time on this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope gentlemen will now consent that we take up the bill by sections for amendment and dispose of it. I think we all concur in the importance of economizing time.

Mr. SAPP. We cannot hear a word the gentleman from Texas is saying.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. REAGAN. We all feel the necessity of expedition in the business of the House with a view to transacting the business before us in the short time we have. I hope it will be the pleasure of members of the committee to try to reach for themselves the conclusion that when an amendment is offered the gentleman who offers it having had five minutes, and five minutes having been occupied by some one who desires to oppose it, we shall then vote on each amendment without prolonging the discussion on the paragraph. I suggest this in the sincere wish to get this measure as speedily as possible out of the way of other business.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds he was mistaken as to the time. The thirty-five minutes to which the gentleman from Texas was entitled began at twenty minutes before two, and his time has now expired. The Clerk will report the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk proceeded to the reading of the bill by paragraphs and read the following:

That the following sums of money be, and are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of the public works hereinafter named.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I offer the amendment which I send up to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Before we enter upon the consideration of the paragraphs of this bill containing appropriations, I desire to offer an amendment, to come in at the end of the paragraph just read, and which has no application whatever to the amounts proposed to be appropriated by the bill.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I desire to offer an amendment proposing that this work shall be done by contract.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The gentleman and myself are on the same line.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] will be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, which was to add to the pending paragraph the following:

All work done under the provisions of this bill shall be let by contract to the lowest responsible bidder in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I move to amend that amendment by substituting therefor that which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of War shall cause to be let by contract all public works authorized under this act except for surveys and estimates. Such contracts shall be made after sufficient public advertisement for proposals in such manner and form as the Secretary of War shall prescribe. Such contracts shall be made with the lowest responsible bidders, accompanied by such securities as the Secretary of War shall require, conditioned for the faithful prosecution of the work according to such contract, and for the proper payment of all liabilities incurred in the prosecution thereof, for labor and material: Provided, That the interests of the Government shall not be actually injured thereby.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) It may be necessary to strike out of the paragraph of the bill the words "and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War," and to add to the paragraph that which has just been read by the Clerk.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not sure but what we had better leave in the paragraph the provision for the appropriations to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I am not strenuous as to that.

Now, one word on the amendment. As will be observed, it is drawn with great care. I believe it is almost a copy of the provision inserted by the Committee on Commerce in the river and harbor appropriation bill of last session, and which passed this House without objection. It recognizes, as I think, an important principle; that where the public interests are not actually interfered with the lowest bidders shall receive the awards to perform this work.

In addition, allow me to say that, with such a provision as this in the law, I believe we shall obtain at a low estimate as much as 10 per cent. additional work, which will be for the interest of the people and of the commerce of the country.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Certainly.

Mr. CALKINS. If this amendment shall prevail, there ought also to be given the Government authority to sell the dredges and other property now owned by the Government which is fitted for use in this work.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I do not desire to enter upon that matter now. I would be glad to have the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] offer a separate amendment to that effect.

Mr. CALKINS. I suggest that the amendment should come in here. The Government owns a large amount of property which, should the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] become a law, will become entirely useless to the Government or to any one else, unless some such provision as I have suggested be inserted in the bill.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I desire to state that the principle of the amendment which I have offered was recognized in the river and harbor appropriation bill passed for 1866, one of the first bills of this kind after the war. I do not understand that the Committee on Commerce or any one else objects to this amendment, and I therefore ask a vote upon it.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. A word, Mr. Chairman. I see no difference in principle between the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the one I have offered. I shall therefore not contend about the phraseology of the amendment, but will accept the one he has offered in lieu of mine.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. The Secretary of War, as I understand it and as I believe, has authority under present provisions of law to advertise for proposals and to give out contracts for this work where it can be done to advantage.

I desire to say that there is much work provided for in this bill which it is almost impossible to contract for; such as dredging, removing snags and trees, and such work as that, which it is almost impossible to estimate for. The present provisions of law authorize contracts to be made where it can be done safely and with advantage.

A provision substantially the same as the one proposed here was incorporated in the river and harbor bill of last session as it passed the House. It was stricken out by the Senate at the earnest request of General Wright, who said that with that restriction much of the money appropriated by the bill could not be expended.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I have put in a proviso to reach such cases as those which probably General Wright had in view when he objected to the provision of the bill as it passed the last House.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I failed to notice it.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I ask that the proviso of my amendment be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the interests of the Government shall not be actually injured thereby.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I understand that to have reference only to the lowest bidders.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) No; it applies to the letting of the contracts. If, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, the interests of the Government will be interfered with by letting the work under contract, the work shall then be done by the Government employing laborers and not by contract.

Mr. WARNER. That is exactly the modification I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to make.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I accept that.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I have no objection to that. It is, as I understand, just the provision of the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The proviso as modified will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, In the opinion of the Secretary of War, the interests of the Government shall not be actually injured thereby.

Mr. MURCH. Mr. Chairman, I move as a substitute for the pending amendment the following:

Provided, That all the money herein appropriated for labor shall be expended under the supervision of the employés of the Government by employing day laborers and mechanics at the prevailing rates of the community in which said expenditures are to be made, and no contract shall be given out except where the employment of day labor on the part of the Government is absolutely impossible.

Mr. Chairman, I am induced to offer this amendment by the knowledge which I possess that the contract system now in vogue with reference to public works has resulted in great robbery to the Government as well as great oppression to the workingmen. I am familiar with the facts on this subject; and I know that in many cases contracts made by the Government with individuals or corporations have been used as means of crowding down the prices of labor, notwithstanding the contractors themselves were reaping a profit of from 50 to 300 per cent. A resolution which I introduced at the extra session of this Congress calling for a committee to investigate the method of constructing public buildings in this country looked to an investigation of the contract system; but by reason of parliamentary tactics well known to all members of the House I have not been able to reach that resolution upon the Calendar. If such an inquiry had been instituted I could have demonstrated to the House and the country that through the contract system now prevailing in the construction of Government buildings and other public works the Government has been robbed of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

I want this amendment adopted for the protection of laboring-men who will be employed on these improvements of rivers and harbors. Without a provision of this kind they will be at the mercy of contractors; and we know too well by the experience of the past what that means. Under the contract system laborers are crowded down until they barely receive enough to keep soul and body together. I speak from intimate knowledge of the facts, having been myself a workingman engaged for a number of years on Government works and having myself suffered from the evil of which I now speak.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I suppose the object of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MURCH] is to require that work done by the Government shall be done under the eight-hour law.

Mr. MURCH. Not exactly that. I want to protect the workingmen, no matter how many hours they work.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) What authority have we to interfere with the contractor, either as to the amount of wages he pays his employés or the length of their service per day? I do understand we have a perfect right to say that for employés of the Government eight hours shall constitute a day's labor.

Mr. MURCH. That is not my proposition at all. I contend that Congress has the right to direct how the public work of this country shall be done, either by day labor or by contract. I know that the contract system has been a curse not only to the Government but to every workingman employed on public works.

Mr. REAGAN. We have now before us a resolution proposing to substitute the contract system for the plan of allowing the work to be done under the direction of the engineer officers. The proposition submitted by the gentleman from Maine is, I understand, directly in conflict with that. I wish to say, however, that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] contains a provision which may have escaped attention, looking in the line of the purpose of the gentleman from Maine. I mean the provision—not very usual but very necessary—that in giving bonds for the performance of work the contractors shall bind themselves to pay their employés. That goes far in the line of protecting the laborers; and I think it a most wise provision.

Mr. MURCH. That is not the object of my amendment at all. I want to make it obligatory upon the Government in entering into contracts with corporations or individuals to put in the contract a provision that workmen shall be employed by day labor, not by piecework.

Mr. REAGAN. That would very materially interfere with the contract system.

Mr. MURCH. I want to interfere with the contract system, for it has proved in many instances a curse.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to make a single suggestion. Does it not appear to the committee on examining this amendment and the proviso that we had better leave the clause just as it is? It is now certainly in the power of the Secretary of War to order this work to be done by contract or not, as he may deem best; and of course on this point he will take the advice of the Engineer Department of the Army, which will be advised by the engineer detailed to attend to the particular work. It seems to me that, in view of this confusion about amendments and provisos, it would be best to leave the clause as it stands.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) There is no confusion about the question. The amendment I have offered was adopted, I think unanimously, by the Committee on Commerce last year.

Mr. O'NEILL. In certain respects and for certain works.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MURCH, it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. COX. I move to strike out the last word.

Now, whatever may be the effect of this contract system or any other system, this whole thing needs regeneration. I believe in certain portions of the country, from information I have received, the Government would by the contract system reduce the cost of this internal improvement business perhaps one-quarter. I was so advised by an intelligent man as to one portion of the district, Shrewsbury River, represented by my friend from New Jersey. I was so informed by an intelligent correspondent. I wrote to him to give me detailed information for the benefit of Congress as to that particular place. He writes me back the following letter, which I ask to have read, and the accompanying editorial made a part of my remarks:

The Clerk read as follows:

RED BANK, N. J., February 10, 1881.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your inquiry for facts in regard to the Shrewsbury River improvements, I inclose slip from the Register of December 9, 1880. The statements made in the article are true and can be verified at any time. The work done by the Government could have been performed by private capital at about one-fourth the cost, or even less.

In regard to Cheesequake Creek: Last summer I made a trip up this stream to hunt up information in regard to the traffic, and the proposed improvements. I was told that the amount of freight carried was very small, being only one or two boat-loads of clay and molding sand per week, with an occasional load of wood. I was further informed that in case the river was improved it would benefit none save one or two firms interested in clay-pits. The stream is from sixty to seventy-five feet wide, and in the three-fourths of a day which I spent there I did not see one vessel passing either up or down the river. It may be claimed that great quantities of clay have been shipped from this section, but the greater portion is shipped at Amboy and has nothing to do with Cheesequake Creek.

Of the other streams in the district I have no knowledge.

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN H. COOK.

Hon. S. S. COX,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. COX. The object of that letter and the article which the gentleman sends to me from the paper of which he is editor is to show these improvements are wasteful; are not made with good judgment; that they do not improve the navigation, and, as was said at the last session by my colleague who represents a district up the Hudson River, they are a positive injury sometimes to navigation. My argument, therefore, not only goes to the contract system, but to the whole system of improvement as now carried on by the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. COX. I ask to have printed with my remarks the editorial to which I have referred.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

The editorial is as follows:

"Improving" the rivers—How the Shrewsbury is being permanently injured—A bar forming at Rocky Point—The Inside or Neptune Club Channel closed—The channel at the Highlands draw-bridge filling up—Real's Channel becoming impassable—The larger sailing-vessels of the river being sold off.

The parties who contracted to remove a quantity of sand and mud from the bed of the Shrewsbury River have stopped work for the winter. Since the alleged improvements have been begun the river has been filling up more rapidly and more bars have been formed across the channels than ever before in so brief a period.

The damage which is at present being caused through the agency of the alleged improvements is the formation of a bar across the main channel of the Neversink River, about midway between Upper Rocky Point and the Neptune club-house; the closing of the inside or Neptune-club channel by the formation of a flat reaching from Lower Rocky Point to the large flat in the middle of the river; the filling up of the channel on the eastern side of the Highlands draw-bridge; and the closing of the channel which leads from the Highlands to Seabright, known as Real's channel. All this injury to navigation has been done recently, and the sailors of the river, with the exception of those who profit either directly or indirectly by the alleged improvements, are almost unanimous in their condemnation. Even of those who are pecuniarily interested in the alleged improvements, many admit among themselves that the river has been seriously injured.

The bar which is formed across the main channel of the Neversink between Upper Rocky Point and the Neptune club-house is the most serious obstruction to navigation in the river, and threatens in time to entirely prevent the larger class of vessels from reaching parts of the river above this point. This bar has been formed since the dikes which constitute parts of the alleged improvements were built. During the past season the Sea Bird has grounded on this bar and remained there for a longer or shorter period at nearly every trip. On Saturday, November 20, Captain John P. White, who oversees the prosecution of the alleged improvements, came home to Red Bank in the tug-boat belonging to the dredging machine, and on Sunday afternoon, November 21, attempted to return to the mud-digger. Although the propeller was of light draft, and although Captain White is more familiar with the river than any other sailor on the Shrewsbury and knew exactly where the channel was, yet the boat ran aground and remained fast on the bar until Monday afternoon, when it was pulled off with the assistance rendered by a passing sail-boat. It is very seldom, and only under the most favorable circumstances, that the packet vessels can pass this point without striking bottom.

The flat which has formed at Lower Rocky Point, and which has completely closed the inside or Neptune Club channel, has been caused by dredging in other parts of the river. Before the alleged improvements were begun, the Sea Bird used to use this channel in her trips up and down the river. At the present time neither the steamboats nor the trading vessels can use this channel, and even pleasure craft get aground when trying to cross the flat. This obstruction was formed by the sand and mud loosened by the dredging-machine, which was carried thither by the current.

The eastern side of the Highlands draw-bridge has been filling up rapidly since the alleged improvements were begun, until at the present time the water is too shallow to permit the packet vessels to pass through. Vessels which attempt to make this passage almost invariably get aground. On Saturday afternoon, November 13, an oyster sloop from Fire Island got aground when passing through this side of the draw, and a few hours afterward the George Hume grounded in the same place and could not get off, although it was high tide at the time. The anchor was carried ahead of the vessel, and efforts were made to "kedge" through, but without avail. The vessel remained aground until Sunday, the draw remaining open all this time. The filling up of the channel at this point is attributed solely to the dredging which has been done further up the river. The dredging-machine, in digging the sand and mud from various parts of the river, loosens a large quantity of dirt, which is carried along with the current and deposited where the nature of the river will permit.

Real's channel, through which vessels pass to reach Seabright, has become so filled up during the last summer that only small vessels can now pass through it, and then only when the conditions are favorable. Many parties in Seabright are injured by this, as they are in want of material, which they can not get except by paying increased freight charges. Most of the vessels of the Neversink River can not get up this channel, and the few that can refuse to do so on account of the time which would necessarily be lost in getting aground and in afterward kedging off. The Emry Ireen, a light-draft vessel, owned by Mead & Taft, a firm of contractors who are building cottages at Seabright, gets aground whenever she makes a trip. The William T. Parker, Captain Edwin Ervin, the smallest schooner which plies the Neversink River, while making a trip to Seabright, got aground in this channel on Friday night, November 12, and remained fast until the following Monday, although an additional crew were procured, and every effort made to kedge the vessel off. The filling up of this channel is also caused by the dredging-machine, which for some time past has been digging a new channel through the large flat which lies between Real's channel on the one side and the Sea Bird's channel and the dyking on the other.

Several of the larger sailing vessels have been sold during the past summer Among them are the John H. Patterson, the Laura Maps, the A. J. Collins, the J. B. Voorhis, and the Gracie Hoffmire. These are all of the larger class of vessels, and they have been taken to other parts. The assumption is that vessels of this size cannot longer be profitably used in the river, and it is probable that the increased difficulty in navigation, caused by the rapid filling up of the river, is one of the factors which makes boating less profitable than formerly.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) One word in reply. The amendment I have offered goes to the extent of giving private capital the opportunity of competing for this work. It not only goes to that extent but even further, for it provides that the contractor shall give bond for the faithful performance of his duties under the contract. It provides that the Government may recover from the owner of private capital who contracts for the construction of any one of these works, for any failure to carry out the conditions of his contract. It is really in the line of a remedy for the complaints which gentlemen make in reference to these works. It gives to the Secretary of War the discretion if in his opinion the interests of the Government are not served by letting the work out to contract, that then he may have it done by day's work.

Mr. ROSS. I am ready to stake my reputation as a member of Congress that there has not been a day's work or an hour's work upon the Shrewsbury River but what has been done under contract, no matter what may be said in the Red Bank Register.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. GILLETTE. I offer the following:

That one condition of each contract shall be that all employés shall be paid before the contractor is paid.

Mr. REAGAN. That amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa is not necessary, because under the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] these contractors are required to give bonds for the faithful performance of their duty under the contract, and that includes, of course, all debts incurred in the construction of the work in the way of pay to employés.

Mr. GILLETTE. I did not understand that provision. I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 103, noes 5.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move to insert after the amendment that has just been adopted the following:

No work shall be begun for the completion of which the sum appropriated to it is not sufficient.

Mr. Chairman, one great objection to the system of internal improvements as now conducted is, that it is carried on in violation of law. This bill provides not that certain work shall be begun, but for completing what has been begun already and constructing new works and completing them. It provides for the construction, completion, and repair of these public works. The Secretary of War or somebody else under him, in violation of the law, has begun between three and four hundred pieces of work and left them unfinished. What I propose by this amendment is, that when we undertake a work of this sort we shall find out exactly what it is and what it will cost, and then vote money enough to complete it, so that Congress will not need to make appropriations for it during a long succession of years.

Let me take an example, Mr. Chairman. I will take Elk River, in West Virginia.

Mr. KENNA and other gentlemen. Vote!

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I do not blame the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] for crying out "vote," as I have something to say in reference to his State which perhaps he does not wish to hear.

Mr. KENNA. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I merely wanted to vote, thinking he had concluded his remarks.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Take Elk; $5,000 were appropriated for it last June. What was it for? It was to enable a party to go down the river and remove overhanging boughs and snags. Five thousand dollars was voted last year for that purpose and $5,000 is appropriated for the same purpose in this bill. The engineer says it will take $100,000 to complete the work. That will be $5,000 every year for twenty years to remove the snags and rocks and boughs from overhanging trees in that little rivulet called Elk River, in West Virginia.

What I wish to say is this: if that river needs $5,000, then let it be voted, and let the contract be made; but let it be insisted that the work is to be finished, and after that has been done, let the gentleman from West Virginia hold his peace. Do not let us every year grant an appropriation of $5,000 for twenty years to go for the same purpose.

All the appropriations in this bill for West Virginia amount to $306,000. I have not had time to look at any other State, and take that State as a sample for the sake of convenience. That sum only is appropriated. The Engineer's estimates, however, show that it will take nearly six millions of dollars to finish these various works. Now, assuming that State to be a fair sample, assuming that my friend from West Virginia has not more than a fair share in proportion to what the other States get, it will take, according to these figures, $200,000,000 to finish the works already begun. My friend [Mr. KEIFER] says we are able to pay, but, for one, I am unwilling to see the public money expended in this way. I do not believe that is the way to dispose of Government funds. Let us establish a fixed price or a fixed limit to moneys to be expended for this character of work, and go to that extent and no further. I have observed, Mr. Chairman, in the Engineer's Report, for I have not had an opportunity of seeing it before this morning, that there are many places where the Secretary of War has not seen proper to do anything because the appropriation, in his judgment, was not adequate to do anything of importance. That was the exercise of a laudable discretion on his part, and I think we ought to establish a general principle, that a rule should be adopted like that intended by this amendment.

I would not oppose any just appropriation for the improvement of the navigable rivers and harbors of the United States. This, in my judgment, is not such a bill. It needs to be radically amended before it will be acceptable to the country, and before it can receive my vote. There are three hundred and fifty separate and distinct appropriations in this bill, ranging from $1,000 to $1,000,000 each. It consists of three hundred and fifty bills conglomerated into one. No two of these appropriations have any relation to each other, and altogether they amount to the sum of $10,179,000. There are many items in this bill which are meritorious and ought to pass on their merits. There are many other items of little merit and which ought not to pass. There are many items that are mere swindles and frauds. The two latter classes of items are put into this bill for the sole purpose of making it go through. If there is any one thing which the American people disapprove, it is log-rolling legislation. It was intended to force this bill through the House under the spur of a suspension of the rules and without debate. That scheme failed. The necessary two-thirds could not be secured.

The usual course has been with the river and harbor bill to prepare it in secret and rush it through this House without giving any opportunity for debate. This year, having failed to do that, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce brings the bill into the Committee of the Whole and calls on his adherents to permit no amendments and pass the bill just as it came from the hand of this committee. In this he has again been thwarted. Amendments have been offered in spite of him, and I trust will be adopted.

We are not obliged to be blind to the fact that the chief motive for combining these three hundred and fifty bills in one is to get votes enough to pass the bill.

Does any one believe that if the $750,000 which the State of Texas gets by this bill were stricken out of it that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] would be anxious to improve Sumpawamus Inlet at a cost of $5,000? Does any one believe that he would support the bill at all if the items it gives his State were stricken out of it, even though every other item should remain just as it is? I cannot stretch my belief to that extent. My faith in him is not strong enough for that.

Texas supports the items in the bill which go to other States because the other States can give Texas votes on the passage of the bill. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce is no better and no worse than any other member of that committee. Every member of this committee has feathered his own nest. The States from which this committee come take over one-half of the money appropriated by this bill. Having glutted themselves, the committee then set about distributing the rest in such a way as to secure the passage of the bill. No money was appropriated in any locality which could not help it on its way. The work of improving rivers and harbors is assumed to be a continuing work. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has asserted that great injury will result to this Government if we fail to make appropriations to continue work which has been already begun.

Who authorized the beginning of any work which the appropriations already made are inadequate to complete? There is no law authorizing any such work. This bill is complete in itself. It does not on its face authorize any work beyond the amounts appropriated. The money appropriated by this bill is "for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation" of the public works. This is the language of every river and harbor bill. And yet the engineers, in violation of law, have sought to mortgage the revenues of the Government for all time to come by expending the immense sums appropriated, not for the "construction, completion, repair, and preservation" of the public works, but for the commencement of vast public works which will never be completed, and which require the expenditure of many millions annually to keep them in progress.

What should be done in the case of any given needed improvement is to appropriate enough money to do the work and finish it promptly. This work should be let by contract to the lowest responsible bidder, and should be finished by a given time. Upon the plan of the engineers nothing is ever finished. Each year the demand increases. On the 14th of June, 1880, we appropriated $8,951,500. Now, in less than eight months comes this bill appropriating $10,179,800 more. Within a single year, if this bill passes, Congress will have voted away $19,131,300 of the people's money.

To recur for a moment to West Virginia. There are eight appropriations in this bill for that State. They amount to $306,000 or about 47 per cent. of the estimates of the engineers for this year. The aggregate of these estimates is $630,500. The cost of the work now in progress in these eight localities is very nearly $6,000,000.

What I desire to accomplish by my amendment is to keep the work within the sums appropriated by Congress.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York. I do not care to consume very much of the time of this committee. I stand here simply to say that I am opposed to all amendments to this appropriation bill, except the amendments that may be offered to guard the improvements which we propose to make in the Mississippi River.

Mr. SAPP. You do not know what they are yet.

Mr. HAYES. I desire to say that in my judgment this is one of the fairest and most equitable appropriation bills that has ever been presented to this House for its consideration. We have the assertion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] in charge of the bill that every item in it has been not only carefully considered by fifteen gentlemen who make up his committee, as honest and faithful as any other fifteen gentlemen upon the floor, but every item has been carefully considered at the War Department, and has been recommended by the engineers who had charge of and who have made the surveys, as well as by the Department itself, and I say that this bill coming before us at this time and with that indorsement it becomes us to take it and take it substantially as it comes from the committee. There may be now and then a little item for which an appropriation ought perhaps not to be made. But let me ask if there has ever been an appropriation bill of any kind put through this House which did not contain some such item? Why, we put through the other day in two hours the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and I will venture the assertion, Mr. Chairman, that there were items in that bill that would not meet the approbation of every member of this House on mature reflection.

Gentlemen have complained that $10,000,000 is too large a sum to be appropriated for our rivers and harbors. Why, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen who make that assertion fail to comprehend, I imagine, the magnitude and importance of the great work for which these appropriations are being made. Look at our great sea-coast, extending from Maine down the Atlantic across the Gulf of Mexico up the Pacific to Alaska. Look at the vast number of bays, inlets, and harbors all along that coast line, and the hundreds of rivers that flow from the interior of our country and empty into the Atlantic, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Pacific Ocean; many of them, Mr. Chairman, navigable for hundreds of miles. Look at the grand chain of lakes on our northern borders, with their splendid harbors and their vast commerce. Look at the mighty Mississippi and the Missouri, that carry the products of a vast empire in itself down through the Valley of the Mississippi into the Gulf of Mexico, and thence to the world, and tell me, with all of these mighty factors in the commerce of this country, if you regard $10,000,000 too much for their improvement, repair, or preservation? Is it too much to promote the interest of our vast commerce, both internal and foreign, which is to be preserved and stimulated by such an appropriation as this?

Our external commerce last year, according to the report of the Bureau of Statistics, was $1,613,000,000, and the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics told me yesterday that our inland commerce was twenty times as much. This would give a grand aggregate of this commerce of over thirty-five billion dollars, and add to that the external commerce, and we have the immense total external and internal commerce of this country reaching the enormous sum of about thirty-seven billion dollars; and yet we are told, notwithstanding the fact that this stupendous sum represents our commerce, that ten million dollars is too much to improve, increase, or maintain that commerce. We are told that it is too much to be appropriated for our rivers and harbors.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I ask consent to print some remarks in connection with this subject in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly. [See page 1522.]

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

There was no objection. [See Appendix.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask the privilege to print in the RECORD a compilation, made carefully, of how much each State gets in this bill, as my former calculation was hurriedly made and crude, and I ask this in order to make it perfect.

Mr. O'NEILL. If it is a correct calculation I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection to the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN VOORHIS.]

The committee divided; and there were ayes 3, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I desire to offer an amendment, to be inserted immediately after the pending paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the paragraph:

"Provided, That no money appropriated by this act shall be expended in the improvement of any stream, notwithstanding the sum be designated by name and appropriated for herein, which in an ordinary stage of water is not capable of floating vessels of fifty tons burden for a length of thirty consecutive miles, and which does not intersect or form part of a State line."

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I desire to say a few words in connection with this subject. In the ordinary business reported to this House by committees it usually happens that there are some members of the committee who are able to give some reasons why a measure should not pass or why it should be modified. In this instance, as I understand it, every single member of the Committee on Commerce is in favor of the bill as it stands without the dotting of an i or the crossing of a t. The members of this House have been practically without information on this subject. The report of the engineers has been inaccessible to all except the members of the committee, or practically so. Day after day have I endeavored to procure a copy, and day after day I have been unsuccessful until yesterday, when by blandishments and—I will not say what else——

A MEMBER. Not bribery.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. In some way I succeeded in obtaining a copy from the room of the Senate Committee on Commerce. That report is entirely without an index. What you get in it you have to get by accident, or you have to read two thousand or more pages.

I opened the report, and accidentally, as it were, I fell upon this description of one of the streams for which this bill appropriates money. It is Secretary Creek, Maryland. Here is a report by the engineers. But before I read the extract I will premise it with this remark. These gentlemen who make these reports live upon the money appropriated in this bill, and of course they will make it appear to be necessary if possible. They will magnify their office and magnify their work. This has reference to Secretary Creek, Maryland. There is a secretary bird, too, and I do not know but it was born and had its origin on this creek. The engineer says:

The whole length is not much over three miles. It is entirely in Dorchester County; its course is almost due west; the declivity of the stream is little or nothing; the currents slow; rise of tide about one and a half feet; the volume of the stream dependent mainly on the tide.

This creek is the water outlet for the trade of the town of East New Market and the surrounding territory, fertile and thickly settled, of about eighty square miles.

Not eighty miles square, but eighty square miles; a territory about equal to two of our congressional townships. And this is introduced as a national measure.

Furthermore, a few pages on, at page 197, I fell across the following, which relates to the Little Kanawha, West Virginia:

The present plan of improvement was adopted in 1877, having for its object the attainment of raft and push-boat navigation.

How is that for national navigation? Now, mind you, the raft and push-boat navigation does not now exist. The object of the bill is to create a raft and push-boat navigation. I read further from this report about the Little Kanawha:

The attainment of raft and push-boat navigation at lower stages than was then practicable, and generally facilitating both classes of navigation, especially the former, from Bull Town to the present slack water. These objects have already been largely secured, and it only remains to carry to completion the present plan to effect all the improvement of the river practicable under it.

And the amount estimated as necessary for completion of this work is $900,000. And this is not the stream that commands the Choptank trade, which comes next to this.

The next is the Big Sandy River, West Virginia and Kentucky. I read from page 196:

The present project so far as improving the natural channels was adopted in 1878, and as to the instituting of slack-water navigation in 1880, the object of the first named plan being to better the raft and push-boat navigation in low stages, and of the second to afford a permanent five-foot navigation. The natural channels are narrow, obstructed, and with as little as three inches of water in them at low stages over shoals and ripples. The amount expended has considerably widened and deepened these channels—

For which God be thanked—and rendered the navigation easier. The appropriation of $66,000 asked is for constructing the first or test lock and dam $60,000, and for continuing improvements of natural channels $6,000.

The whole amount estimated to be necessary for the completion of the existing project is $1,872,000. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OSMER. If I am recognized, I yield my time to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CHALMERS. Is not debate on the amendment exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state what is the rule. Five minutes are allowed in advocacy of the amendment and five minutes against it. The gentleman from Iowa has occupied five minutes for the amendment, and now the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OSMER] proposes to yield him five minutes, and the Chair asked for objections.

Mr. CHALMERS. I object to anything outside of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and the enforcement of the rule is insisted on.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OSMER] is against the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN. I am in favor of it, and if recognized will yield my time to the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Mississippi objects. In that case ten minutes would be consumed in advocacy of the amendment, leaving no time for opposition.

Mr. McLANE. I rise to oppose the amendment. No amendment could be more injurious to the best interests of the country than that offered by the gentleman from Iowa. The western and southern commerce is developed by the deepening of the shallow streams that lead into the deep streams. And the population of the country interested in these shallow streams perhaps are most deserving of the sympathies of this Congress. If you take the State of Iowa and the State of Missouri, you will find the appropriations asked for are quite as often for the small streams as for the big streams.

Mr. SAPP. I will tell the gentleman that there is not a dollar appropriated for anything in Iowa except for the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers.

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman from Iowa has complained that the Missouri is not provided for. I want his attention specially to the fact that no part of the Missouri River, which he desires to have improved, could be improved if the amendment of his colleague was adopted.

Mr. SAPP. Certainly not. I am aware of the fact that the committee entirely ignore the Missouri.

Mr. McLANE. They do no such thing. They are very liberal, and I hope the committee will find very judicious appropriations made for the Missouri River.

Mr. SAPP. How much is appropriated for the Missouri River?

Mr. McLANE. Much more than the gentleman states; I will answer his question in my own time. I am now dealing with his colleague who proposes that we shall fix a depth of water, and shall improve no river containing a less depth. I say that the adoption of his amendment would prevent improvement of the Missouri and of the Upper Mississippi River and in many respects the Lower Mississippi. It is to that point that I ask the attention of the gentleman who stands here and complains that his Missouri River has not been provided for; and yet he is ready to support his colleague who would have us adopt an amendment which would exclude all appropriations for the Missouri River for which and its immediate tributaries the bill appropriates between three and four hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SAPP. Why so?

Mr. McLANE. One of the important improvements upon the Missouri River is at a point where there is not half the depth fixed by this amendment as the minimum, and near the mouth of the Missouri the navigation is in danger of being altogether closed.

Mr. SAPP. Not three inches of water for the Missouri River?

Mr. McLANE. I say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] that if the committee shall adopt his amendment it will destroy those very features of this bill which gentlemen from his section have taken the most interest in, and I tell him further, that some of the improvements on the Missouri are at points where the depth is at low water only about twenty-three inches, I think, and therefore I say to him that the amendment of his colleague directed against creeks in Virginia and Maryland, in fact assails the Missouri River improvements.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CHALMERS. I object to that; it is a formal amendment only.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has a right to move the amendment, but he has no right to withdraw it except by unanimous consent.

Mr. COX. I hope my friend from Mississippi will allow me——

Mr. McLANE. I ask for a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF.]

Mr. COX. I have offered a formal amendment, as has been done many times before. I do not know why I should be made an exception. I want to have the compliment, if there is any compliment in it, of following my distinguished friend from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE.] He is here evidently to advocate that little Secretary Creek in his State.

Mr. McLANE. I call the gentleman from New York to order.

Mr. COX. For what?

Mr. McLANE. The item for Secretary Creek is not now before the committee.

Mr. COX. Well, I am before the committee. [Laughter.] I am like Secretary Creek. I am not very large in dimensions. [Great laughter.]

Mr. McLANE. I want the gentleman from New York to direct his attention to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York to move a formal amendment for the purpose of addressing the committee on the subject before the committee.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Maryland will gain nothing by these little snapperadoes of practice. I am used to meeting them. I want to answer my friend from Maryland, and why will he not allow me to do so? He said that I was not right when I said that democratic precedents favored something else than this peculiar line of legislation. He said he could show more democratic Presidents or statesmen—I am not certain which.

Mr. McLANE. Two to your one. Two democratic Presidents who signed river or harbor improvement bills for every one that vetoed such bills. I can say three for one.

Mr. COX. I did not make the point two to one; but I will give you two Presidents who based their vetoes of such measures as this on democratic precedents and doctrines. The first which I quote is the famous veto measure of President Polk, of August 3, 1846, in which he said:

The Constitution has not, in my judgment, conferred upon the Federal Government the power to construct works of internal improvement within the States, or to appropriate money from the Treasury for that purpose. That this bill assumes for the Federal Government the right to exercise this power, cannot, I think, be doubted. The approved course of the Government and the deliberately-expressed judgment of the people have denied the existence of such a power in the Constitution.

Mr. CHALMERS. Was not General Cass the author of that, and was he not afterward nominated by the democratic party for President?

Mr. COX. I ask my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] who was at that time connected with the executive office while Mr. Polk was President, to state if this clear enunciation of democratic principle did not come direct from the occupant of the White House to Congress? Indeed, it is within my knowledge that my friend copied that very message——

Mr. CHALMERS. The bill which President Polk vetoed was introduced by General Cass, who was afterward nominated for President by the democrats.

Mr. COX. Yes, and got beaten. [Laughter.] Here is more of the wisdom that came from the South and its true democratic statesmen in the earlier and better days of the Republic, when the dangerous practice prevailed of combining all these measures, good and bad, for big and little objects in one bill. I read from the same message; and the quotation is but the echo of democratic sentiment and platforms up to and until the desire for local improvement submerged the landmarks of the Constitution.

The wisdom of the framers of the Constitution in withholding power over such objects from the General Government and leaving them to the local government of the States becomes more and more manifest with every year's experience of the operation of our system. In a country of limited extent, with few such objects of expenditure, (if the form of government permitted it,) the common treasure might be used for the improvement with much less inequality and injustice than in one of the vast extent which ours now presents in population and territory. The treasure of the world would hardly be equal to the improvement of every bay, inlet, creek, and river in our country which might be supposed to promote the agricultural, manufacturing, or commercial interests of a neighborhood.

There is both constitutional interpretation and human sagacity in these ideas, and if they only came from one statesman of the democratic type they justify my vote and action on a miscellaneous and multifarious measure like this ten-million bill.

President Polk asks and demands what President Pierce afterward asked and demanded. As a safeguard against these mischievous bills he urged that these measures should each be placed in a separate bill. He demanded that each item should be determined on its intrinsic, independent merits. What endless wrangle and bickering would be saved by such a prudent system. It would be wise beyond our later experience. I stand here on that ground, believing that to yield to such pernicious practice is to ignore our best democratic instruction and make an example of wasteful excess for a troubled future.

Why not bring in your separate bill for the Missouri River? Why not bring in your separate bill for the Mississippi River? Why not bring in your separate bill for Secretary Creek? Why not bring in your separate bill for your shallow push-pole and brush-impeded streams and railroad-tie, hoop-pole, and raft navigation? Then we can decide each one on its own merits or demerits when it comes up for debate, comparison, and consideration. I ask permission to print some more of the wisdom of democratic statesmen.

Mr. CHALMERS. I object.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman object to my printing further extracts?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that objection is made.

Mr. COX. Then I must take advantage of some other opportunity to get them before the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman will print the approval by President Jefferson of the Cumberland-road bill.

Mr. COX. I will give you the real old Jeffersonian doctrine before I am done; and it will go to the foundation of our polity as a Federal system and its reserved and delegated powers.

Mr. McLANE. I rise to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is to strike out the last word—a formal amendment.

Mr. McLANE. But it is an amendment which the Chair entertained, and is debatable. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] had the right to speak for five minutes in favor of it, I have the right to occupy an equal time in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed; the Chair will not undertake to restrict him.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. McLANE. I waive my right to the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. My point of order is that the discussion should be confined to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, so that we may vote upon it and get it out of the way. These great underlying questions of constitutional law which my friend from New York alludes to may come up another time. Let us now dispose of these practical questions.

The CHAIRMAN. As no one is claiming the floor now to discuss the amendment, the point of order is not applicable to anything before the committee; but if it should be made hereafter, the Chair will endeavor to confine members to the pending question.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. COX, to strike out the last word, it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa; and there were—ayes 51, noes 91.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, and Mr. McLANE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 47, noes 108.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to amend by inserting the following:

Provided, That no money appropriated by this act shall be expended in the improvement of any stream, notwithstanding the same be designated by name and appropriated for herein, which in an ordinary stage of water is not capable of floating vessels of fifty tons burden for a length of thirty consecutive miles, and which does not intersect or form a part of a State line: Provided, That this restriction shall not apply to tide streams emptying into the ocean.

Mr. Chairman, I said something to-day, if I remember aright, about the Big Sandy and its character. I now want to call attention to the Guyandotte, which is one of the streams I desire to have excluded by this amendment. In the report of the Engineer Department I find the following language respecting this stream:

The present plan of improvement for this river was adopted in 1878, and has been carried on in accordance with this to date, the object being to improve the whole river for raft navigation primarily, and for push-boat navigation at certain special points; for both species of navigation the river was practically closed save on rises of considerable height.

It has not been possible to combine these two species of navigation on the Guyandotte. "Push-boat" navigation was too much for it, provided raft navigation were added. [Laughter.]

So much for the Guyandotte. Now I come to the Elk River, West Virginia. This is one of the streams which I think ought to be excluded. Here is what the Engineer's Report says on page 691:

The obstructions are rocks, snags, and overhanging trees.

Think of a great navigable stream obstructed by "overhanging trees." My friend from Indiana knows that the Wabash could not be obstructed by "overhanging trees." Think of an "overhanging tree" obstructing the navigation of the Mississippi River or the Missouri. Here is a stream upon which the commerce of the nation is to float; and unfortunately there are "overhanging trees" which obstruct it. [Laughter.]

Before the river can be considered properly prepared for the full development of the trade upon it which the resources of the country will probably produce and maintain—

It is prepared now for all the trade there is—some or all of the private mill-dams should certainly be removed or modified.

Now, let the country understand, let this House permit the country to understand, that $10,000,000 is appropriated, in part at least, in order that the national commerce can be push-boated over modified mill-dams. Just think of it—rafts and push-boats carrying the great commerce of this mighty nation over modified mill-dams. I can see the Committee on Commerce, (for whom I have the highest respect, and I have heard some of them talk in magnificent phrase about the rich wealth of the products of this country and its magnificent commerce,) I can see that committee with push-boats pushing that mighty commerce over a modified mill-dam, provided the "overhanging trees" are removed. That is the character of the Elk River.

The Engineer's Report says:

The money thus far has been spent in conformity with the idea of making an open navigation of ten or twelve inches in depth.

How is that for the mighty commerce of America? Ten to twelve inches in depth. Not now, but it is expected to be secured in order that the mighty commerce of the country may be pushed over these modified mill-dams. [Laughter.]

Now, what is going to be the cost of it? The report goes on to state:

The unexpected cheapness and success, however, of the work of the last season lead me to conclude that what remains can be done for very much less than the amount of that estimate, which was $100,000.

The estimate is now modified to $90,000.

I come next to the Kentucky River. Here is a stream that has some title to respect. The Engineer's Report says:

The present project for the improvement of this river is that proposed by Major W. E. Merrill, corps of engineers, in his report of August, 1879, on the survey of the river, contemplating slack-water navigation of six feet depth, with permanent dams for the main river, i. e. up to Three Forks, or for two hundred and fifty-eight miles. There is at present no regular or permanent navigation, the five old locks or dams on the lower eighty-two miles of the river having become, by disasters and neglect, practically useless, and above them there is but little water in low stages without ripples and bars of rock and gravel scattered along the channel.

The first appropriation for this river was $100,000. The amount appropriated in this bill, if I have got my figures right, is $100,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX. I move to add to the amendment the following:

Provided no money shall be appropriated in this bill for any river exclusively in one State.

I beg to support that amendment by further extracts from the messages of democratic Presidents. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] said that Jefferson signed the Cumberland-road bill. So he did; but upon the ground that it was a post-route. He considered it, I suppose, somewhat constitutional on that ground. But for a statement of the rationalia of the Jeffersonian ideas of government on this head let me refer to the message of President Pierce, to be found on page 2079 of the Statesman's Manual, volume 3. Gentlemen cannot comprehend the cogent reasoning in pure diction—the genuine democracy as illustrated by the analyses of our fundamental authority and limitations—except by a perusal of the whole document. I beg, I plead with them to read it. Only by its thoughtful reading can gentlemen do justice to the sentiment which inspires my opposition to this measure.

The doctrine which gentlemen advocate is nowhere more pertinently denounced than in this extract:

Annual and special messages of successive Presidents have been occupied with it, sometimes in remarks on the general topic, and frequently in objection to particular bills. The conflicting sentiments of eminent statesmen, expressed in Congress, or in conventions called expressly to devise, if possible, some plan calculated to relieve the subject of the embarrassments with which it is environed, while they have directed public attention strongly to the magnitude of the interests involved, have yet left unsettled the limits, not merely of expediency, but of constitutional power, in relation to works of this class by the General Government.

It is quite obvious that if there be any constitutional power which authorizes the construction of "railroads and canals" by Congress the same power must comprehend turnpikes and ordinary carriage-roads; nay, it must extend to the construction of bridges, to the draining of marshes, to the erection of levees, to the construction of canals of irrigation; in a word, to all the possible means of the material improvement of the earth by developing its natural resources anywhere and everywhere, even within the proper jurisdiction of the several States. But if there be any constitutional power thus comprehensive in its nature, must not the same power embrace within its scope other kinds of improvement of equal utility in themselves, and equally important to the welfare of the whole country? President Jefferson, while intimating the expediency of so amending the Constitution as to comprise objects of physical progress and well being, does not fail to perceive that "other objects of public improvement," including "public education," by name, belong to the same class of powers. In fact, not only public instruction, but hospitals, establishments of science and art, libraries, and, indeed, everything appertaining to the internal welfare of the country, are just as much objects of internal improvement, or, in other words, of internal utility, as canals and railways.

The admission of the power in either of its senses implies its existence in the other; and since, if it exists at all, it involves dangerous augmentation of the political functions and of the patronage of the Federal Government, we ought to see clearly by what clause or clauses of the Constitution it is conferred.

* * * * * * * *

There being no specific grant in the Constitution of a power to sanction appropriations for internal improvements, and no general provision broad enough to cover any such indefinite object, it becomes necessary to look for particular powers, to which one or another of the things included in the phrase "internal improvements" may be referred.

Failing to find such general or particular powers, he exercised his prerogative at the same time, laying down a civic lesson from which we have wofully departed. The bill which he vetoed was over a million. Since then, in spite of his special warnings, we have reached ten times that amount per annum.

Now, sir, I desire once more to put upon record this decision of President Pierce, following the decisions of democratic Presidents:

In view of all this, it is not easy to estimate the disastrous consequences which must have resulted from such extended local improvements being undertaken by the General Government. State legislation upon this subject would have been suspended and private enterprise paralyzed, while applications for appropriations would have perverted the legislation of Congress, exhausted the national Treasury, and left the people burdened with a heavy public debt beyond the capacity of generations to discharge.

Mr. Chairman, ponder this wisdom in the light of new facts of our physical progress! We have now in this country, constructed partly by the aid of States and private capital, or at least we had up to 1878, four billion four hundred and eighty million dollars' worth of railroads. It is many millions more this year, 1881. We had also of canals built by States—Delaware Canal, Maryland Canal, Illinois Canal, Indiana Canal, New Jersey Canal, New York Canal, and Ohio Canal—at least $120,000,000, all ordered by State legislation and paid for out of taxes upon the counties and upon the States. Other States perhaps have not the same advantages. Is it right to tax the States which built, at their own expense, their own communications, to pay for the improvements of other States not so generous and wise?

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. COX. Well, sir, ask it.

Mr. BRAGG. Does not the gentleman from New York know since that doctrine was maintained that the Federal courts which then had admiralty jurisdiction only up to ebb and flow of the tide, have extended that jurisdiction over the great lakes, over the Ohio River, over the Missouri River, over all the streams leading into the waters that empty out of the Saint Lawrence River; that that jurisdiction has been taken by the Federal courts and those streams are under Federal jurisdiction?

Mr. COX. That may be all true; but I ask you, whether or not every time there is a decision of the Supreme Court extending tide-water or other Federal jurisdiction, the gentleman will come forward and vote for these "log-rolling" bills with their millions of mixed measures? He will not do it. He is, I know, an economist on certain matters, a very strict one.

What is log-rolling? You men of the West know. It is well to recur to it for the illustration. You know that in early times the pioneer went to seek his home not upon the prairies, but into the woods where there was plenty of water and timber. They and their neighbors may not have combined their labors to cut down the trees and to hew out the logs or split the rails; but when it came to rolling the logs together in heaps for burning or to be lifted into their places for the cabin or barn, they had many hands to aid the necessary works. Woe then to the man or neighbor who refused or who failed to come and assist in the log-rolling. He never got help to have his cabin built, his land cleared, or any outside assistance unless he helped others. That is what log-rolling means. Is it not a good figure for just such a bill as this? You get together all the States you need, all the strength and interests in one bill you require, and all the indispensable votes that you can in its favor. You have combined them altogether here. You have their aid. Why? Because you return the favor to them which they show you.

As these precedents which I have quoted show you, there is danger here. It intrenches upon true economy. Is it a dishonesty or any implication of unfairness on the part of the committee, when I can quote from these democratic precedents, to show that this system is wrong from top to bottom?

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to say a word in connection with this matter.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I hope my colleague will yield to me for a moment, to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York. I propose that he amend or modify his amendment by inserting after the word "river" the words "or harbor," so that it will read, "no money herein appropriated shall be expended upon any river or harbor exclusively within any one State."

Mr. COX. I prefer not to accept that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. I thought it would simply complete the absurdity of the amendment.

Mr. COX. The gentleman knows very well that I do not accept my absurdities from that quarter.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman need not go to any quarter for that.

Mr. COX. I take my absurdity from another quarter; that is from myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. Nature has furnished the gentleman with enough without seeking elsewhere. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I do not see why the gentleman should make this personal assault upon me, this violent attack. I had enough of that the other day, when I was kicked by a mule or something else. [Great laughter.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. Did you get a pension?

Mr. COX. No; but I ought to have one for endeavoring to rescue the Government from a dangerous enemy.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. Mr. Chairman, it does not come in good grace from a member representing a Western State to oppose slight appropriations to be given for improving streams in the State of Kentucky. It is not fair, Mr. Chairman, because our State happens to have no very considerable rivers, and because she is an internal State, and has neither coast line nor harbor to improve, that she is to be cursed with the fact that she is not to have a dollar for improving her internal streams. It is neither fair nor just. Gentlemen have forgotten that the Western Reserve gave over two hundred million acres of land to be expended in improvements at tide-water, and the State of Kentucky and Tennessee because they have no coast lines or harbors are to be deprived of all benefits under this system of improving rivers and harbors. I say, it comes with bad grace from the gentleman from Iowa, whose State has received so much, to object to a trifling appropriation for the State of Kentucky. Under that doctrine we could not expend one dollar in improvements there, and that great State could never get anything, while the Western region combines together and makes a just claim for the development of their resources, and that they should have a larger portion of these immense amounts annually appropriated for those works. They forget, sir, that Kentucky has to bear its due share of the burden of paying them. During all the years that these appropriations have been made, Kentucky has contributed more than any other State toward the building up of our commercial resources. Kentucky has been in the Union for eighty-nine years, and has never received from the Federal Treasury for improvements but the pitiful sum of $311,000, not one-twentieth of the amount annually devoted to the development of the resources of these States.

The gentleman talks about the depth of water in those rivers being only so much, and that no money shall be appropriated for the improvement of the Kentucky River because the depth of water is so slight, and speaks of it being only six feet. Mr. Chairman, if I were to go to Wisconsin, I could point out the fact that at Port Washington they commence with from nine to twelve inches of water and now they have five feet, and expect to improve it so as to make it twelve. I might go to Ahnepee, Wisconsin, and it is the same thing. We have more water in the Kentucky River than they had at Port Washington even with its improvements. Now Port Washington has a commerce of over ten thousand tons, because it has been developed. Thousands and thousands of dollars have been expended upon these harbors and others, while we with our great commerce and vast inland trade have never received our share, or anything like even a small fraction of it. The doctrine contended for here is the doctrine that the people who have the misfortune of not living upon these great streams should pay their part of the money into the Treasury but should not have a dollar out of it for improvements. You will give those who have harbors and navigable streams and who happen to be favored, vast sums of money to extend the depth of water from twelve feet to sixteen feet or above; but where you have one or two or three feet you have nothing to give because it is not a great stream and you do not believe it possible they can improve it.

But, Mr. Chairman, the bulk of this commerce is on the small streams. The streams of a small country and the productions of a small country are just as dear to the people as though they lived on a great stream and represented the commerce of a great country, and they should have a proper proportion of the money which is expended for that purpose. This great State, which has contributed its millions of dollars into the Treasury, a State which pays annually some thirteen millions of dollars into the Treasury, gets not a dollar of public money expended within its border for public improvements. Is that fair? Ought not there to be some consideration for the money which she pays into the Treasury? Of the $475,000,000 expended by this Government for public buildings for internal improvements and for educational purposes, $399,000,000 of it have gone to Northern States and, sir, only $76,000,000 to the Southern States, when, according to their population and area and wealth and the amount they pay into the Treasury, they should be entitled to at least two hundred and ten million dollars. For years and years they have contributed on an average of 44½ per cent. of the whole amount——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON. I ask that the amendments be again reported.

The amendments were again read.

Mr. WILSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I move to strike out the last word. As I was called out of the House temporarily I had not the pleasure of hearing the whole of the remarks made by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF.] But I heard some of his criticisms on the streams of West Virginia. I will say to that gentleman that he at least is laboring under a very egregious error. As I understand the object of this river and harbor bill, it is for the development of the resources of the country, and to throw into the markets of the several States and the markets of the world the rich commodities now locked up in the regions to which those rivers furnish an outlet.

The gentleman referred to one of those streams, the Little Kanawha. I desire to say that in my opinion there is no river of the same length and size in all these United States of America the improvement of which is so valuable and which will contribute so much to the general welfare of the country. Let me enumerate some of the commodities of the district through which that river flows. Its timber finds a market (as shown by papers accompanying the Engineer's report) everywhere from New York to New Orleans. In consequence of the small improvement made in it a few years ago, timber has been floated down to Parkersburgh, shipped thence by rail to Baltimore, and from there sent to Europe. The valuable hard lumber of West Virginia finds a market in California. It is shipped by rail three hundred miles to Baltimore, and from there is shipped sometimes to California and sometimes to Europe. Its oil finds a ready sale in all the markets of the world. The oil produced in that country, the outlet of which is this Little Kanawha River, adds something to the balance of trade in favor of this country against foreign nations. And that oil has been floated down this river to market.

The sawed lumber of the Little Kanawha reaches more than a dozen States in the Union. There are vast coal-fields and vast iron-fields there; and the coal from the country along that river, by reason of the improvements now being made, will be shipped and will reach the people of the western and southern cities.

This is the best bill we can have to regulate interstate commerce. It gives cheap fuel, cheap food, and cheap transportation. It opens up competing lines, and can never be governed by monopolies. It is the farmer's improvement, and enables his productions, the fruits of his honest labor, to reach markets without the skinning process of pooling, rebates, &c.

Mr. SAPP. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments now pending.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I object to the withdrawal of the formal amendment. I want to say a few words before it is withdrawn.

The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] says I have been mistaken in my remarks about the Little Kanawha. My remarks in regard to that stream were read from the report of the Engineer; the official report. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce, when he was arguing against permitting discussion or amendment on this bill, and portraying the labors of the committee, said they had read this report and studied it day after day for I do not know how long. Then I am justified in saying this bill was reported in the light of this report; and the report as to the Little Kanawha says the only object of its improvement is to attain a raft and push-boat navigation; and the estimate of the amount necessary to complete the project is stated at $900,000.

Now, I put this to the gentleman, that the appropriation, though small in itself, will not be worth one fig, and might as well be sunk in the Potomac unless it is followed up by appropriations large enough to complete the project, which, it is estimated, will cost $900,000.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] will understand——

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. The gentleman has his quarrel with the engineers, the men who make their living out of these appropriations, and who, as we all know, will magnify their office.

Mr. WILSON. You do not have——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will address the Chair.

Mr. WILSON. We are only having a little tête-à-tête. [Laughter.]

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. Whatever light we can get against these appropriations comes in unconsciously, for not one of these engineers would permit such remarks to be made as I have read if he dreamed that the use would be made of them that is now being made. Other engineers in other districts—and I have examined the reports enough to learn that—do not appear to have made such remarks. But here was a man who was a subordinate and did not have any more sense than to tell a part of the truth. [Laughter.]

These engineers are divided and subdivided into strata. There is first the boss engineer, and then a stratum below him; then another stratum and so on down until you get to the local engineers. It reminds me of the old distich:

Big fleas have little fleas,
And lesser fleas to bite 'em;
And these fleas have other fleas,
And so ad infinitum.

[Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. Now one word——

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. So these reports come up from the "little fleas" to the "big fleas;" and in a few instances the "little fleas" have told the truth. What I have referred to has been found by accident. How much more could be found by careful examination I cannot tell.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. That shows how much you know about it.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. If I can do so well with the little knowledge I have, how much could I do if I had as much as you claim to have? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. Just a word. Because the gentleman does not obtain the appropriation he desires, he seems to be willing to form a combination with his friends over there to defeat proper appropriations. He is playing the game:

Tickle me, Toby, oh, tickle, do;
You tickle me and I'll tickle you.

[Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate upon the pending amendment has expired.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. SAPP. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

But the amount so appropriated shall be used in removing snags out of Missouri River and in completing the survey of the same.

Mr. REED. Now we have the real milk in the cocoanut.

Mr. SAPP. Now I ask that the amendment be read as it will stand if my amendment should be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no money appropriated by this act shall be expended in the improvement of any stream, notwithstanding the same be designated by name and appropriated for herein, which, in an ordinary stage of water, is not capable of floating vessels of fifty tons burden for a length of thirty consecutive miles, and which does not intersect or form a part of a State line: Provided, That this restriction shall not apply to tidal streams emptying into the ocean; but the amount so appropriated shall be used in removing snags out of the Missouri River and in completing the survey of the same.

Mr. SAPP. A word or two upon that amendment. I do not know that I would have engaged in this discussion at all but for what was said by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. MCLANE.] It is insisted by him that so far as the Missouri River is concerned she has been liberally dealt with by the Committee on Commerce. That I must emphatically deny.

I desire to call the attention of this committee to the amounts appropriated in this bill for the Missouri River for general purposes, and the items of appropriation so specified. There is $45,000 appropriated for the removal of snags in the Missouri River; then $40,000 for the improvement of the Missouri River, above the mouth of the Yellowstone; then $30,000 to complete the survey of over three thousand miles of that river. That is all that is appropriated for the Missouri River for general purposes in this bill.

Now, a word or two in relation to the importance of that river as a navigable stream. I need not call the attention of this committee to the fact that the Missouri River is navigable for nearly four thousand miles. I need not call attention to the fact that the Missouri River drains a territory sufficient in extent for a great empire. I need not call attention to the fact that that river runs through the richest agricultural country on the face of the globe, a country now thickly peopled by industrious and enterprising citizens. I maintain that the claims of the Missouri River have been very greatly overlooked by the Committee on Commerce.

Now, one word in regard to the local appropriations which are made in this bill. Whenever anything is said by any of us in relation to the appropriations made for the Missouri River, we are met with the assertion that sundry appropriations are made for local purposes and benefits. How is that? It is true that some appropriations are made for the improvement of the channel of the Missouri River at various points. What is the character of those appropriations? Are they such as are deserved? Not at all. A mere pittance is appropriated for some particular point, and when the ice runs out of that great stream in the spring of the year all the work done by that little appropriation is rendered useless by the results of the spring flow.

Mr. BARBER. What is the aggregate amount of these local appropriations?

Mr. SAPP. The gentleman can examine the bill for himself. Twenty thousand dollars was appropriated to be expended at Council Bluffs and Omaha, while the engineers recommend some sixty thousand dollars for that improvement. So in regard to Brownsville, Nebraska, Saint Joseph, Missouri, Fort Leavenworth, and various other places along the Missouri River. I say that there is not sufficient appropriated for these local improvements to complete the work as recommended by the engineers—only enough really to begin work, so that in the course of three, four, five, or six months after work has ceased all that has been done is swept away. Money spent in this manner might just as well be thrown into the channel of the river.

Mr. REAGAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] that the form of his amendment might do injury; that if he desires to get the judgment of the House upon streams appropriated for, as he deems improperly, in this bill, he should move to strike out those items as we reach them. In that way we shall act upon each question directly.

Mr. SAPP. I want to say to the gentleman that the difficulty is this: if I were to undertake——

Mr. REAGAN. I cannot yield. I am now speaking of what the gentleman's colleague proposes.

Mr. SAPP. I hope the gentleman will withhold his suggestions if he does not want a reply.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman has made his speech, and I propose in a moment to reply to him; but I am now replying to his colleague and am making the suggestion that if he considers any of these items objectionable he should move to strike them out as we reach them, and not by an amendment of this sort run the risk of injuring really meritorious works.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa who has just taken his seat, [Mr. SAPP.] has taken occasion several times to speak of the absence of appropriations in this bill for the Missouri River. He urges now that the appropriations ought to be sufficient to complete the work. Why, sir, that is said with reference to every work provided for in this bill. To have made the appropriations upon that idea would have involved the necessity of reporting a bill appropriating $25,000,000.

But let me show that the gentleman cannot have examined the bill carefully. It will be seen how much justice there is in his complaint that the Missouri River has been neglected when I give some of the items of appropriation for that river: For Atchison, Kansas, $20,000; Brownsville, Nebraska, $10,000; Cedar City, $15,000; Council Bluffs, Iowa, $20,000; Eastport, Iowa, $14,000; Fort Leavenworth, $8,000; Glasgow, $20,000; Kansas City, $20,000; Lexington, $10,000; Saint Charles, $15,000; Saint Joseph, $20,000; Sioux City, $7,000; Vermillion, Dakota, $15,000; above the mouth of the Yellowstone, $40,000; and for the continuation of the systematic survey of the Missouri from the mouth to Fort Benton, $30,000. Then of the appropriation of $150,000 for removing snags from the Mississippi, the Missouri, &c., $45,000 is assigned to the Missouri, and $20,000 to the Yellowstone, thus making $329,000 for that poor, neglected Missouri River.

Mr. SAPP. Only $115,000 is appropriated for general purposes.

Mr. REAGAN. I think the gentleman cannot have examined the bill. I have shown that $329,000 is given for that river besides the improvement of its various tributaries, to say nothing of the interest which the State of Iowa has in the appropriations for the Mississippi River. The appropriation for the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Illinois to the Des Moines Rapids is $175,000. Then, Iowa is interested in the $600,000 proposed to be appropriated, between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Illinois. She is also interested in the $200,000 which we recommend to be expended between the Des Moines Rapids and Saint Paul. Yet the gentleman complains on behalf of the State of Iowa and the Missouri River! Why, sir, that great central region of country which depends so much for the value of its agricultural products and the other interests of its people upon navigation and commerce has received the chief attention in this river and harbor bill.

Mr. SAPP. How can we get to the Mississippi River from the Missouri, if you do not take out the snags?

Mr. REAGAN. I have shown that $329,000 is given by the bill for the improvement of the Missouri River.

Before the hammer falls I will repeat that if the gentleman from Iowa can point out any rivers unworthy of an appropriation, he should move to strike them out when we reach them. I hope he will not insist on his present amendment, which may do real harm.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SAPP to the amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move that the committee rise. It is now four o'clock, and it is time for us to adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. VAN VOORHIS, there were—ayes 35, noes 90.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I call for tellers.

Mr. CAMP. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is made that no quorum has voted; and the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. REAGAN. I submit that a quorum is not necessary on a motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair thinks the Committee of the Whole would be very much embarrassed in the transaction of any business if it should go upon the record that no quorum is present. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from New York, Mr. VAN VOORHIS, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. REAGAN.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 129.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move to amend that amendment by striking out the words "for thirty consecutive miles."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question again recurred on the amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF of Iowa.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 91.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers; and Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, and Mr. REAGAN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 32, noes 121.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VALENTINE. I wish to have my amendment read.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto in one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state there is an amendment pending of the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. VALENTINE.]

Mr. REAGAN. I demand a vote on my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 107.

Mr. CAMP. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 21.

The SPEAKER. That is not one-fifth of the last vote, and the yeas and nays are not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. REAGAN. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the river and harbor appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and the amendments thereto be closed in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I now move the House adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 104.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. No quorum has voted.

Mr. CAMP. I demand tellers.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and tellers were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 752) granting an increase of pension to Crafts J. Wright; when the Speaker signed the same.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. REAGAN. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to go on with the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. CAMP. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 123, noes 4.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. VAN VOORHIS and Mr. REAGAN as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 140, noes 9.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate on the pending paragraph and the amendments thereto is limited to one minute. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CAMP. There is an amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska sent up an amendment which has not been read.

Mr. VALENTINE. It is not applicable to the pending section, and I withdraw it.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I have an amendment which I desire to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of paragraph 1:

"Provided, That no new work shall be begun unless the sum hereby appropriated for that work shall be sufficient to finish and complete the same."

Mr. REAGAN. There is one minute left for debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto. I wish to say but one word, and it is this: that I have no more interest in the success of this bill than others, and if it be the purpose of members of the House merely to wear out the time by filibustering—and it looks like that—then there is not much use in trying to go on with it. I am willing to give a reasonable time to see whether it is the purpose to defeat this bill by filibustering, and if it is, then I shall get out of the way and let it be done.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I have the right to offer an amendment, and the gentleman from Texas has no right to charge me with filibustering.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. REAGAN. I believe that amendment has been voted on once before.

Mr. COX. Is it in order now to move to amend an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. COX. Then I move to strike out the last word. Is it in order to debate that?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. COX. Then I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HOUSE. Has not the amendment just proposed by the gentleman from New York been once voted upon to-day and rejected?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I want the gentleman from Texas to understand that this amendment is limited to new work. The other applied to all work appropriated for. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment, the Chair will state, is almost the same as the preceding one, which was rejected. But there is some difference, and the Chair prefers to submit the question to the committee.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. On the point of order I desire to say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has overruled the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MURCH. I offer the following amendment, to come in between lines 10 and 11 in the second paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the committee have not reached that paragraph yet. The Clerk will read the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Richmond Island Harbor, Maine: Completing improvement, $3,000.

Mr. MURCH. I now offer the following amendment—

Mr. COX. I make the point of order on that paragraph of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For improving Rockland Harbor, Maine, $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman from Maine proceeds the gentleman from New York makes the point of order against the paragraph just read.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa has been voted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COX. I made the point of order because I want to inquire whether any appropriation for this purpose has been heretofore made. I wish to know whether it is in the continuation of appropriation for work there or whether it is new work?

Mr. REAGAN. Twenty thousand dollars was appropriated for this work last year.

Mr. COX. Then the point of order probably will not lie on this paragraph.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. Was that money expended?

Mr. REAGAN. Three thousand dollars I find has been expended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order upon the statement made without undertaking to decide now what may be the character of the bill, because on that question the Chair may want to hear the views of gentleman on the floor.

Mr. MURCH. Mr. Chairman, I went before the Committee on Commerce for the purpose——

Mr. REAGAN. Let the amendment be reported again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CLYMER. I make the point of order upon that.

Mr. MURCH. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that there was an appropriation made last year for this purpose.

Mr. CLYMER. Then I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MURCH. Mr. Chairman, I went before the Committee on Commerce during one of its sittings urging this appropriation, but they rejected the application on the ground that the board of engineers had made no report upon this. Since issuing their annual report a plan has been adopted for the construction of this breakwater at Rockland. Twenty thousand dollars was appropriated for this purpose last year, and the local engineer there has already advertised for proposals to construct the breakwater. I could have the reports of the engineers read here as far back as 1856 showing the great necessity for this improvement..

Mr. Chairman, this is a harbor, and the only one which can be reached by vessels within a range of seventy-five miles on that coast. In our semi-arctic region the fall and winter navigation of that section of our State is exceedingly difficult and dangerous. We have located now a life-saving station within ten miles of this place, there being no harbor in which a vessel of any proper dimensions can enter for the purpose of shelter from storms. There is, as I have stated, no adequate harbor in a range of seventy-five miles on that coast. The work there is ready to be begun.

The local engineer in charge has planned a breakwater, and in such a manner that every appropriation which may be made for it is utilized, and if discontinued for any purpose no bad results will follow and no loss accrue to the Government. I come before this committee, Mr. Chairman, urging that the river and harbor bill be increased, and I know that the idea is unpopular among members here. I do not think that this, however, is a great amount to be appropriated for such purposes. I regard this bill as one of vital importance to the interests of the country, and I am in favor of appropriating $50,000,000 for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of this country if it can be done honestly and where needed. Besides, this bill has no terrors for me if the money is honestly expended; and, when the Government of the United States is receiving an annual surplus of $90,000,000 of revenue, it is time to include the repairs and improvements of our rivers and harbors in our general legislation. Neither the gentleman from Iowa nor any other gentleman upon this floor can make the point of order upon this appropriation for the reason that it is a continuing one. Neither can it be made upon the ground that it is for an improvement of some small, shoal stream. It is a large harbor, one of the finest in the country, and our people have been trying since 1856 to get an appropriation for a breakwater there for the protection of its shipping. Thirty thousand vessels, according to the report of the light-house keeper there, pass by and enter that harbor annually. It is, as I have stated, the only available harbor on the coast along the line of seventy-five miles where the navigation is difficult and dangerous.

The winds from the east and northeast have a range of forty miles and bring upon our harbor a great overflow of water which destroys our docks and shipping. The Ulysses, a new steamer, not long ago broke from her moorings during one of the storms prevalent on that coast, and was wholly destroyed. A large bark was driven ashore and badly damaged. Our docks are inundated by every gale of wind we have. Rockland has been a very important ship-building port. At times we have had as many as twenty-seven ships on the stocks at once being built.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of giving more time for the gentleman from Maine to complete his statement, which is of importance.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana proposes to take the floor and yield his five minutes to the gentleman from Maine. Is there objection?

Mr. BROWNE. I object. The same proposition was made for gentlemen on this side and was objected to.

Mr. KENNA. If the gentleman from Maine occupied other five minutes, would not that exhaust the time allowed for debate?

Mr. MURCH. I hope the members of the Committee on Commerce will make no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. MURCH. Then I ask consent to print the remainder of my remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine one question. Who is responsible for and under whose direction are these expenditures made?

Mr. MURCH. If I could hear the gentleman's question I would endeavor to answer it.

When the hammer fell, Mr. Chairman, I was saying that we were a ship-building city, and this, coupled with our large production of the best lime manufactured in the country, makes this port very important in a local sense.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will let the board of engineers testify on this subject. In 1852 Lieutenant J. Newton, (now General Newton,) of the United States Engineer Corps, made a report to the Chief Engineer of the Army, from which I make the following extracts:

It is the only harbor for the larger class of vessels between Townsend and Belfast, embracing an extent of coast of nearly seventy-five miles. These headlands—Owl's Head and Jameson's Point—are two miles nine hundred yards from each other and may be said to form the entrance to the harbor, which is thereby exposed to the winds that range from north-northeast to south-southeast. The wind being east-northeast traverses from twenty to thirty miles of the Penobscot Bay before entering the harbor, which, with the great depth of water, occasions a very heavy sea. When the winds are more easterly the sea is less on account of the interposition of the Fox Islands, which, in the direction due east, are only eight or nine miles distant from the entrance to the harbor. When east by south, or east-southeast, or near these points, a heavy sea is thrown in from the ocean which is said to be more destructive than any other to which the bottom is exposed, though it passes into the harbor in a rather indirect manner between the Fox and Monroe Islands. These winds bring in a vast body of water, with a heavy ground swell washing the wharves and causing vessels to drag their anchors.

* * * * * * *

The harbor is accessible with all winds as long as a vessel can carry sail and is free from obstructions. * * * The bottom is of blue clay and forms a most excellent holding ground. * * * Vessels running down the bay, with a storm threatening from the usual quarter, after passing Rockland * * * find no safe harbor until they reach Herring Gut, fifteen miles distant from the latter place; but this place being small is often crowded, and incapable of holding more; so that they are obliged to continue this course fifteen miles more to Townsend, which furnishes a safe and spacious anchoring ground. Again, vessels bound up the bay, with a storm threatening, would not leave Townsend or Herring Gut unless there was a good harbor at Rockland. * * * Besides the protection to general commerce by a breakwater at Rockland, there is a large local interest involved in this matter, three hundred vessels, coasters and fishing craft, are owned here, and about two hundred more are estimated as trading with the place. Rockland, from a very small village, has grown into a large town of 7,000 inhabitants within the space of ten years, and is deservedly considered one of the most flourishing places in Maine. Its prosperity flows from a source which will probably not fail it, to wit, the manufacture of lime.

The number of barrels of lime manufactured is now 1,000,000 per annum, for the burning of which 70,000 cords of wood are required. The value of property annually afloat and consequently exposed is—

|---|---|
| 1,000,000 barrels of lime at eighty cents per barrel | $800,000 |
| 70,000 cords of wood at $3 per cord | 210,000 |
| Total | 1,010,000 |

To this must be added the value of vessels, (over one million more.) Besides the support of its own population Rockland supplies a large back country, and by this induces other branches of trade which are continually augmenting. In fine Rockland is increasing rapidly, and bids fair to increase for a long time.

* * * * * * *

For the above reasons I recommend Rockland Harbor for the proposed breakwater.

This report, Mr. Chairman, was made twenty-eight years ago. Let us see what more modern engineer investigations show. I take the following from the report of Generals Tower and Newton, addressed to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, under date of September 10, 1880:

The harbor of Rockland, an indentation of the coast at the southwest extremity of Penobscot Bay, is formed by the projecting headlands of Owl's Head and Jameson's Point. It is exposed to the direct action of the winds from N. 22° E. to S. 69° E.; from N. 22° E. to N. 70° E. The winds generally have the whole sweep of the bay, with a rake of twenty-three miles, throwing in a heavy sea.

When the wind is east-southeast, or about that point, it is said that a heavy ground-swell is thrown into the harbor, more destructive than any other to which the bottom is exposed, though it passes into the harbor in an indirect manner. * * * The harbor has a wide entrance and good anchorage, is deep and spacious, and with competent protection would prove valuable as a harbor of refuge. From the returns made by the light-keeper at Owl's Head, it appears that between sunrise and sunset, from January 1 to December 31, 1879, the number of vessels passing his station amounted to 21,539, including barks, brigs, schooners, sloops, and steamers. This enumeration excludes vessels passing outside through the Fox Island Channel. If to the above be added those passing after sunset, the number might be estimated at nearly thirty thousand.

No convenient harbor of refuge exists for a long stretch of coast, the contiguous harbor at Owl's Head being exposed to winds from N. 28° E. to E.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in view of the facts embraced in the foregoing extracts from the reports of engineering experts, and in the fact that we have a line of ocean steamers every day in the week from Boston, and a line of steamers from Portland touching nearly every day, with two lines of steamers running from Rockland to Mount Desert, with a number of smaller steamers running to the adjacent islands, that we present almost as meritorious claim for improvements as is presented for the improvement of the Little Kanawha in West Virginia.

The neglect to appropriate for the breakwater at Rockland may occasion great loss of life and property. Our hardy seamen need this protection. Our commerce that now exists demands the construction of this breakwater. The Government can well afford it and this Congress will be remiss in its duties if it refuses the small amount of $25,000 asked for.

The question being taken on Mr. MURCH'S amendment there were—ayes 38, noes 76.

Mr. MURCH. A quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Maine, Mr. MURCH, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. REAGAN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 106.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving harbor at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $20,000.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move to strike out the last word in the paragraph just read. I am prepared to vote for the proposition if it is a proper one; but I do not know anything about it. The committee have told us nothing about it, but have merely put it in the bill. I want the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to explain why the harbor at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, requires $20,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the committee in giving that explanation would have to confine his remarks to the amendment, which is, to strike out the last word. The gentleman from New York might reach his object by moving to strike out the whole clause.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Then I move to strike out the paragraph. And I ask the chairman of the committee if he can give any good reason why the appropriation should be made? [After a pause.] If the chairman of the committee is to sit down and give no answer because he can give none, I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving harbor at Provincetown, Massachusetts, $5,000.

Mr. COX. Are these new or old works?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. They are old works.

Mr. REAGAN. I think all these paragraphs make appropriations for continuing old works.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Oakland Harbor, California, $60,000; and the sums of money heretofore appropriated for this improvement and unexpended are hereby reappropriated; but the sums so appropriated and reappropriated shall not be available until the right of the United States to the bed of the estuary and training-walls of this work is secured, free of expense to the Government, in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War.

Mr. PAGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out $60,000 and insert $100,000.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to criticise or find fault with the amount of money appropriated for any of the rivers and harbors outside of my own State. But I wish to urge upon the committee the necessity and importance of this work situated in my own State, with the wants and necessities of which I am familiar. I do not object to this bill because it appropriates too much money. I base my objections to it upon the fact that it has not discriminated in favor of the important works, and has made appropriations, large appropriations, for what in my judgment are unimportant works.

My idea of the duties devolving upon the Committee on Commerce is that they should take into consideration first the question as to what is absolutely necessary for the improvement of a certain river or harbor, and what are the obstructions which have to be removed in the interest of commerce. The next question to be considered should be the importance and the amount of commerce carried upon the river or entering the harbor.

I speak, Mr. Chairman, in behalf of Oakland Harbor, a portion of the bay of San Francisco. Oakland Harbor is on the east side of the bay of San Francisco. The Government has already appropriated some two hundred and fifty thousand dollars or more for the improvement of this harbor to which is brought the commerce of the Asiatic countries, and of the whole interior portion of my State. The people in the great producing valleys of the Sacramento and the San Joaquin find that Oakland Harbor is the point from which the wheat produced in the State should be shipped to foreign markets. And the commerce coming from China and Japan by sea ought to be landed at the Oakland wharf for reshipment over the great overland highway of the country. Oakland is the terminal point of the two great transcontinental railroads.

My amendment is to appropriate $100,000 instead of $60,000 for the purpose of continuing this improvement. The State of California, let me say to the committee, is entitled to some little consideration. I find upon consulting the records and the statistics that the bay and the harbor of San Francisco, of which this improvement is a part, in the amount of money collected as custom duties is the fourth harbor in the United States; only three other ports collecting more than is collected at the harbor and port of San Francisco. I find that in the payment of internal revenue California stands ninth on the list of States; only eight States paying more than California pays into the Treasury of the United States. In the Public Lands Department California pays more money into the Treasury than any other State. In point of tonnage it is the third of all the States in the Union. It is this harbor which must receive the commerce of Asia. There is not a port more important, not only to the Pacific coast but to the entire country. The tea and coffee shipped from foreign ports ought to have their reshipment from this harbor. We propose to remove the obstructions that are there.

I see the chairman is about to let the hammer fall. I hope some gentleman will take the floor and yield me five minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. If I am recognized I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SPARKS. Oh, we cannot agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. ANDERSON. No gentleman rises in his place to object.

Mr. CLYMER. I move to strike out the last word, and will give the gentleman my time.

Mr. PAGE. Am I permitted to go on?

The CHAIRMAN. No gentleman having risen in his place to object, the gentleman from California may proceed.

Mr. BARBER. I wish to ask the gentleman from California how much is the unexpended appropriation?

Mr. PAGE. The amount appropriated last year was $80,000, and of that $60,000 was tied up by a foolish provision attached to the appropriation.

Now, this is the first opportunity that California has ever had upon the floor of this House, in the eight years that I have been a member of it, to present her claims before the people of this country for appropriations of this character. This is the first river and harbor bill that during that time has ever been before the House for discussion.

Consequently the time of the Committee on Commerce is very much taken up with their own matters. I acquit them of any intention to do any injustice to any one. But that committee has really not time to hear the two hundred and ninety-three members of this House separately in presenting their claims for consideration. My judgment is that this is the proper way in which a bill of this kind should be considered; in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If two hundred and ninety-three members cannot be depended upon to pass upon the question of properly distributing over ten million dollars, how can it be expected that a committee of only fifteen members can do it?

I have never asked and I do not now ask for one dollar of appropriation that is not of general interest, not simply for the people of one locality, but for the people of an entire State. The State of California will export this year in wheat alone over fifty millions of bushels. It is a State that produces more wool for exportation than any other State in the Union, and also more wine. The harbor on the east side of the bay of San Francisco is the terminal point of two great transcontinental railroads, where ship and car can meet and exchange the commerce not only of the State of California and of the Pacific coast as well as of the Indies, but of the Eastern States also.

The people of the eastern portion of this country are interested that the commerce which they send to and receive from the Pacific coast shall not be landed on the San Francisco side of the bay, where they are compelled to pay storage and wharfage, &c., and then to take it in cars across the ferry to Oakland. It is for their interest that the ship as it comes in from foreign ports shall be able to sail up to the wharf, there to meet the car which will take the commodities it bears and carry it for three thousand miles across to the eastern portion of this country.

I ask that the appropriation I have indicated be made, and I desire to say that later on I shall move to strike out the proviso in this paragraph, and I think I can give good reasons why that proviso should be stricken out.

Mr. COX. I rise to oppose any increase of appropriation in this bill, and I do so upon a ground which I think the people will approve and which I trust this House will confirm. We are piling up taxes inordinately upon the people of this country and their industries. The men who favor a high protective tariff are also and always in favor of these large expenditures; and those who will act wisely as to lessening our taxes will disfavor these large expenditures, such as are contained in this bill, for all sorts of improvements.

We have now two modes of collecting the revenues for the support of this Government. About three-fifths of the amount for the support of the Government is collected on imported commodities; about two-fifths internal revenue, mostly on spirits, tobacco, &c. A large amount of taxes collected on imported commodities is collected from articles of absolute utility, not upon luxuries.

Under our present tariff laws (see Spofford's Almanac, 1879) over eighty-six million dollars is collected upon cotton manufactures, wool and its manufactures, flax and its manufactures, hemp and its manufactures, iron and steel manufactures, earthen and crockery ware, glassware, leather fabrics, breadstuffs and provisions, rice, salt, wood manufactures, sugar and molasses, and tin and its manufactures. Last year we raised nearly a hundred millions of dollars from such sources. What are these immense sums raised for? To pay these contractors or somebody for these works on streams, in harbors, &c.—unconstitutional purposes, according to democratic authority.

Now, where one dollar of the amount raised under our tariff system goes into the Treasury, I believe I could demonstrate, if I had more time than five minutes—and I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] would bear me out in that—where you get one dollar into the Treasury you impose upon the people ten dollars of taxation which never sees the Treasury. It goes elsewhere. Where does it go to? Every one who votes to pile up these taxes upon the people by increasing appropriations for such internal improvements as this bill contains must bear in mind that for the ten millions of dollars which is appropriated by this bill a hundred millions of dollars is taken out of the pockets of the people, which does not go into the Treasury, but goes to the bounty-fed manufacturers of certain pet localities. Mr. Chairman, I may be asked how much is collected from the people for their luxuries by their indirect tariff taxation. I will refer them to page 37 of the American Almanac of 1879. We will there find that diamonds, dolls, embroideries, feathers, furs, silks, spirits, tobacco, watches, toys, plate glass, musical instruments, and one or two other articles yielded a custom revenue of less than $30,000,000.

Mr. DUNN. Suppose that this bill should not pass? Will taxation be thereby reduced?

Mr. COX. I think if we should cultivate certain habits that look to economy and frugality in our expenditures we would here soon begin to remodel our tax system to correspond so that after a while it will be all right with my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] and his fleeced constituents. How could there be any trouble, if we should try the experiment of frugality and stop paying out these moneys for wasteful and useless and abnormal purposes? But so long as there is a plethora in the Treasury, growing out of immense direct and indirect taxes, so long will these big bills come rolling in.

I want to cut down all taxation, by tariff or otherwise. I would take the tax off legacies, matches, stamps, medicines, &c. I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, [Mr. CARLISLE in the chair,] of the bill which you have in charge, and at the same time, I would endeavor to razee these insidious robberies, or rather burglaries in the form of tariff duties. Pile up taxes by these river and harbor appropriations for little streams and great streams, useful harbors and useless harbors, in one bill, without discrimination, and so long as you do it there will be a lamentable lack of that reform which is needed in our revenue laws and exchequer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE,] to increase the appropriation for Oakland Harbor from $60,000, as provided in the bill under consideration, to $100,000.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 60, noes 79.

No further count being called for, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. It is now growing late; and I presume it is not the desire of the committee to continue the consideration of the bill later this evening, though of course that would be agreeable to me. As there are a great many gentlemen who have expressed a desire that the committee rise, and the House adjourn, I make the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. PAGE. I have one more amendment to offer to this paragraph.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well; go on.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the committee will not rise. We are making very satisfactory progress.

Mr. PAGE. I have no objection to the committee rising, if that is the general desire.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas move that the committee rise?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CAMP. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the motion. If we do not get on with this bill an hour or two this evening we may lose the bill. This House has sat through the hours of the night upon a mere private bill, and I do not see why members should be unwilling to stay here awhile longer to work upon this very important public measure. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CAMP, it was agreed to, there being—ayes 95, noes 55.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1327) to grant lands to Dakota, Montana, Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming, for university purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 2075) to amend section 989, Revised Statutes, relative to suits against officers of the United States; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 156) in relation to the International Exhibition of 1883.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask leave to have an amendment printed in the RECORD. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ATKINS, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 14, 1881.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the credentials of FRANCIS M. COCKRELL, chosen by the Legislature of Missouri a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1881; which were read and ordered to be filed.

Mr. HOAR presented the credentials of HENRY L. DAWES, chosen by the Legislature of Massachusetts a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1881; which were ordered to be filed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting the final report of the commissioners having charge of the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue between the Treasury Department and the Capitol grounds; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I notice that on Saturday the Chair "laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copies of letters from the Commissioner of Pensions relative to the condition of the working force of his office and his appropriation for 'contingent expenses;' which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations." I think, as that information is desired by every Senator, those letters should be printed; and I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, presented the petition of the National Temperance Society, Hon. William E. Dodge president, J. N. Stearns corresponding secretary, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that similar petitions have hitherto gone to the Committee on Finance, and this petition will be so referred.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Chicago, Illinois, favoring an appropriation for a harbor of refuge in Milwaukee Bay; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of the Board of Trade of Chicago, Illinois, praying for the passage of a law to prevent the adulteration of food and drugs; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the memorial of the Home Bitters Company, of Saint Louis, Missouri, remonstrating against abolishing the stamp tax on proprietary medicines; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EATON. I am requested to present the petition of the Good Templars of Connecticut, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain. I am led to say, in offering this petition, that I hope and trust there will be a constitutional amendment adopted previous to this one so that the count of the electoral votes once in four years may be had without terror going all over this land. It will be time enough then, in my judgment, to consider a constitutional amendment of this character. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDOLPH presented the petition of the Good Templars of New Jersey, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I present a similar petition of the Good Templars of Virginia, which I move be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I present the petition of the Grand Division of the Sons of Temperance of the State of Georgia, officially signed, asking for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain. As the petition asks for an amendment to the Constitution, I think it ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary, though the petitioners have coupled it with a special request that it go to a special committee on alcoholic liquors. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, as it proposes a constitutional amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope my friend will not insist on that motion. That very proposition was made several years ago, and after a very full discussion, by an almost unanimous vote of the Senate, it was decided that this matter touched the revenue so closely that the Committee on Finance was the proper committee to consider it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Such petitions have hitherto gone to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. THURMAN. They have all been so referred, and I hope this petition will take the same course.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not understand what the Committee on Finance has to do with amending the Constitution; but as I am ready to do almost anything to gratify my friend from Ohio, I will agree to a reference to that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS. I present the memorial of the ex-trustees of the public schools of the District of Columbia, remonstrating against a proposed amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 5541) to establish a municipal code for the District of Columbia. Notwithstanding the bill has been reported to the Senate, I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COKE presented the petition of the Galveston Temple of Honor, of the State of Texas, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of the Grand Temple of Honor and Temperance of New York, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RANSOM presented the petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of North Carolina, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BECK. Within the last few minutes I have found upon my table this note:

WASHINGTON, February 14, 1881.

DEAR SIR: Will you have the kindness to present to the Senate the inclosed petition and request its reference to a select committee on the alcoholic liquor traffic.

Very truly, yours,

A. M. POWELL.

Hon. J. B. BECK.

The petition for the proposed constitutional amendment reads:

The undersigned, citizens of Ohio, request a constitutional amendment to be adopted.

It seems to be officially signed; but as I do not believe in meddling with what people eat or drink and do not think Congress has anything to do with it, and as I do not propose to meddle with what the people of Ohio want, I take the liberty of turning the petition over to the senior Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

Mr. THURMAN. I will present the petition. I present the petition of citizens of my State, in decent and respectful language, and I present also another petition of the same kind, praying for the adoption of a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all acoholic beverages throughout the national domain, and I move that they be referred to the Committee on Finance, as I cannot move for a select committee, as the petition specifies.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether there is a select committee on alcoholic beverages?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair knows of no such select committee. These petitions have hitherto gone to the Committee on Finance, and the petition presented by the Senator from Ohio will be so referred.

Mr. SAUNDERS presented the petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Nebraska, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of E. Whitcomb and 59 others, citizens of Friend, Nebraska, surviving soldiers of the war for the Union, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented the petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Iowa, officially signed, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of the State Temperance Union of Rhode Island, signed by Edwin Metcalf, president; H. W. Conant, corresponding secretary; Charles E. Carpenter, treasurer, and J. Hobart Cross and H. H. Richardson, vice-presidents, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the petition of the Temple of Honor and Temperance, of Vermont, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR presented a resolution of the Legislature of Massachusetts, favoring the enactment of such laws as will promote the revival of the commercial marine of the nation; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
In the year 1881.

Resolution regarding the revival of American commerce.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their earnest and continued efforts toward securing the passage of such measures by the Congress of the United States as will in their judgment best promote an early and permanent revival of the commercial marine of the nation.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor is hereby requested to transmit a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

SENATE, February 4, 1881.

Passed. Sent down for concurrence.

S. N. GIFFORD, Clerk.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 9, 1881.

Passed in concurrence.

GEO. A. MARDEN, Clerk.

Mr. FERRY presented the petition of D. N. Runnels, of Port Huron, Michigan, praying that the Canadian barge W. J. Spicer, rebuilt in the United States, be granted the privileges and protection of an American-built vessel; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLATT. I present the petition of the Good Templars of Connecticut, officially signed, representing 4,000 members, praying for the adoption of a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain. This petition is accompanied by a request that it should be referred to a select committee on the alcoholic liquor traffic. I understand that these petitions have gone hitherto to the Committee on Finance, but I understand also that petitions of this character referred to the Committee on Finance have received no action. I should be very glad if there were a select committee to which they could be referred, because I think the subject is a grave one, and it ought to be considered by a committee that has time to devote to the subject; but as there is no such committee, and as it is too late in the session to ask for the raising of such a committee, I suppose it will take the usual course and go to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I present the petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Rhode Island, signed by Mrs. J. K. Barney, president; Mrs. George F. Martin, vice-president; Mrs. C. H. Higgins, treasurer; and Mrs. E. S. Burlingame, corresponding secretary, all most estimable ladies of Rhode Island, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain. I move, according to the custom of the Senate, that this petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNSIDE presented the memorial of Elijah F. Locke and others, citizens of Apponang, Rhode Island, surviving soldiers of the war of the rebellion, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PADDOCK presented the petition of J. Mason Smith and others, of North Bend, Nebraska, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Frederick Mende and others, of Camp Sheridan, Nebraska, and the petition of D. C. Simmons and others, of Salem, Nebraska, Union soldiers, praying for the passage of the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions to the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, favoring an appropriation for the construction of a harbor of refuge in Milwaukee Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Richardson and others, of Defiance, Ohio, soldiers of the late war, praying for the passage of the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions of the United States Senate to the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Cragg and others, citizens of Howard City, Kansas, soldiers in the late war, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLUMB. I present the petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of the State of Kansas, officially signed, praying for the adoption of a constitutional amendment to prevent the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain. This question is one which has received a great deal of attention in my State where public opinion has been crystallized in the shape of a constitutional amendment, which was adopted at the recent election, by a majority of the electors of that State, prohibiting the manufacture or sale within the limits of that State of alcoholic beverages except for medicinal, mechanical, or scientific purposes. It is a matter which I hope will receive the careful consideration of the Committee on Finance, to whom I move the reference of the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented the memorial of J. H. Langdon and others, citizens of Fredericksburgh, Iowa, surviving soldiers of the war for the Union, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOOTH presented the petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of California, having 13,000 members, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALLACE presented the petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Pennsylvania, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL. There has been handed to me to present to the Senate a petition addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives, signed by W. D. Crandall, grand secretary of the grand lodge of Missouri, Independent Order of Good Templars, which represents over 25,000 members in the State of Missouri, praying Congress, by appropriate legislation, to adopt and propose to the several States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which when ratified will prevent the manufacture, importation, and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. I present a similar petition from the State Temperance Alliance of Maryland, and I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE presented the petition of A. Jiles and others, citizens of North Carolina, praying for the passage of the House bill making the Cape Fear River in that State a free river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PENDLETON presented the petition of St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal church, of Delaware, Ohio, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of the Bangor Division Sons of Temperance of Maine, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMPTON presented the petition of the Good Templars of South Carolina, signed by its officers and members, asking for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KELLOGG presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans, Louisiana, in favor of the enactment of a permanent bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution of the Shreveport Medical Society, of Shreveport, Louisiana, in favor of clothing the National Board of Health with all powers necessary for the execution and enforcement of its rules and regulations relating to sanitation, inspection, scientific investigation, and the collection of vital statistics in so far as they do not conflict with the rules of State and local boards of health; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of West Virginia, in favor of ceding to that State the vacant lands and water-power at Harper's Ferry, in the county of Jefferson; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. VOORHEES presented a resolution of the Legislature of Indiana, on the subject of contagious diseases among cattle; which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Enrolled joint resolution No. 9, (senate.)

Whereas the live-stock interests of the country are greatly endangered by the existence in several of the Eastern States on the Atlantic seaboard of contagious pleuro-pneumonia of cattle; and

Whereas the States, under the decision of the Federal courts, are powerless to protect themselves from infection from a neighboring State or to stamp out contagious diseases existing on its borders in an adjoining State; and

Whereas this state of things has resulted in the adoption of regulations by the British Government which seriously interfere with our export trade in cattle with that country, thereby entailing great damage to all cattle raisers and feeders in the United States; and

Whereas there is now pending before the national House of Representatives at Washington a bill introduced by General KEIFER, of Ohio, embracing measures to prevent the spread of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and other contagious diseases of domestic animals, and to extirpate such diseases in localities where they exist: Therefore,

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their influence to secure the passage of the bill known as the Keifer bill, or such other bill as may be introduced in Congress for the suppression of contagious diseases of domestic animals in the United States.

WILLIAM M. RIDPATH,
Speaker of the house of representatives.
THOMAS HANNA,
President of the senate.

Mr. BAILEY presented the petition of the Grand Division of Sons of Temperance of Tennessee, officially signed, asking for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2139) to amend an act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes, approved June 16, 1880, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2128) to amend section 699 of the Revised Statutes, relating to writs of error and appeals, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5097) appropriating money toward the expense to be incurred in the centennial celebration of the battle on Groton Heights, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SAUNDERS, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1516) establishing the Territory of Pembina and providing a temporary government therefor, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOOTH. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 73) authorizing a payment of prize money to officers of the Farragut fleet for the destruction of enemy's vessels in April, 1862, have instructed me to report it favorably with an amendment. I have prepared no written report; but the official correspondence discloses all the facts as well as they could be stated in a report, and I file that with the bill.

COURTS IN TEXAS.

Mr. GARLAND. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6942) to fix the times for holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Texas, to report it without amendment, and I am directed to ask for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Is that a bill establishing new terms of the courts?

Mr. GARLAND. It simply changes the time of holding the courts at three different places, for the convenience of all persons—lawyers, judges, and suitors.

Mr. HOAR. I see it is to take effect within a very few days from the present time.

Mr. GARLAND. That is the reason I asked for the consideration of the bill now.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will hear my question, I want to ask him what I suppose there is probably no doubt of, whether the question of preserving all rights under recognizances has been considered by the committee? Does the bill do that?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, sir; everything——

Mr. HOAR. For instance, when a person has given bail to appear at one time, what is the effect of the bill on that obligation?

Mr. GARLAND. I am informed by the Representatives and Senators interested that there is no trouble in that respect at all. Everything has been cared for, and the only reason for fixing the 1st of March was for the very purpose of avoiding all trouble on the point suggested.

Mr. HOAR. My question was to the Senator reporting the bill, not to Representatives and Senators of Texas. As I understand, the bill changes the civil and criminal terms of the courts in the western district of Texas, changes the day of holding them; and it is to take effect within fifteen days from the present time. My question to the Senator is whether the bail given by criminals to appear at the old time at the old place is in any way saved in this bill? I did not hear any such provisions; and I ask whether there should not be some holding of the court at the old time, so that in all cases of recognizances and bail-bonds the rights of the Government may be preserved? Otherwise very serious questions may arise. That is the inquiry which I ask the honorable Senator.

Mr. GARLAND. I understand it now. The question has been considered by the committee not only in this case, but in the case in reference to Virginia which passed last week. The committee is of the opinion that the Government would not be injured in that respect, and it cannot run any hazard at all.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator inform me why not?

Mr. GARLAND. That would take some time. I should have to cite a great many cases, and it would take a long argument; but I have answered the question directly that the Senator has propounded. I feel sure that the general statutes on the subject of changing the terms of circuit and district courts are sufficient on this point. If the Senator desires a report upon that subject or a speech of some length, of course I can make it.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose that every Senator is responsible for the preservation of the interests of the United States, for the correctness of legislation. The Congress certainly can pass no law impairing the obligation of a contract; and a change of the time and place of holding a court, if it required the bail to see that the principal was present at the new time and place, would change the contract. Therefore the criminal would be discharged. It has been usual when a law goes into operation between two terms of a court to insert a saving clause that the appearance should be made at the old place and time, and then the case continued to the new, so that there might be an opportunity for the bail to discharge themselves.

I interpose an objection to the consideration of the bill at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that unanimous consent is asked for the consideration of the bill. I desire to object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent was asked, and there being no objection the bill has been considered. The question is whether the bill shall be ordered to a third reading.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that the Senate should put in the usual amendment to the bill before it passes.

Mr. MAXEY. The bill reported by the Senator from Arkansas, on behalf of the Judiciary Committee, is one of great importance and very urgent, because the Legislature of Texas is now in session, and it is desired to make the holdings of the State courts correspond to the holding of the United States circuit and district courts. I am receiving dispatches in regard to it, and I know it to be important.

The point raised by the Senator from Massachusetts was considered by the Judiciary Committee, as the Senator who reported the bill has informed us. I am not prepared to state what would be the ruling in the Federal courts in this regard. I do know, however, that in the State courts where I have knowledge of the practice it is regarded as not in any way whatever affecting the contracts so far as bail and other bonds are concerned. Being a public act of which all persons take notice those giving bail bonds are required to conform their appearance to the change in the holding of the court, it being a jurisdictional question and not a question relating to contracts.

Mr. HOAR. I will not insist further on the objection, but——

Mr. MAXEY. I hope the Senator will not, for I want the bill passed.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say to the Senator from Texas, however, that that precise point was made on a bill which came from the Judiciary Committee at the close of the last session in regard to some other State, and the members of that committee themselves conceded the necessity of a provision reserving the rights of the Government, and an amendment was put in on the floor of the Senate. I am very much surprised, if I have correctly heard the reading of the bill, at the expression of opinion by that learned and able committee that you may pass a law simply changing the time and place of holding a court and compel all persons who, as sureties for criminals, have undertaken to see that they are present at one place and at one time to have their principal present at another place and at another time. It is certainly a novel doctrine; but if the Judiciary Committee, as the Senator says, have carefully considered this, perhaps they have ascertained that there are no criminals in Texas.

Mr. MAXEY. This is precisely like a bill that has already passed at the present session in regard to the courts in the western district of Virginia, and no objection was raised; and I can see no reason why objection should be raised now.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. THURMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to say to the Senate that in order to discharge its duties it is very important that that committee should have leave during the remainder of this session to sit during the sittings of the Senate, whenever it may find it necessary to do so; and I ask leave of the Senate that it may so sit.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio, from the Committee on the Judiciary and in behalf of that committee, asks that that committee may have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate for the remainder of the present session of Congress. The Chair hears no objection, and the leave is granted.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. FERRY asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 159) in relation to the barge W. I. Spicer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. WITHERS, Mr. EATON, and Mr. BLAINE the conferees on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 6719) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WITHERS, Mr. BECK, and Mr. MCMILLAN submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

POTOMAC LONG BRIDGE.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be directed to report to the Senate what damage has been done to the Long Bridge by the recent flood in the Potomac, and whether in repairing the same some method cannot be adopted that will diminish the probability of inundations of the city hereafter.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. My object in introducing the resolution is to call attention to the fact that a very large proportion of the disaster that befell this city on Saturday last is undoubtedly due to the faulty construction of the Long Bridge. Two or three spans of that structure were removed and now stand upon the ice perhaps a thousand feet below the piers from which they were swept. It is the judgment of those best qualified to pass opinion upon the subject, I believe, that if a clear water-way had been left under that bridge the city would have been protected from that calamity. I hope that some action will be taken by the commissioners and by Congress in the repair of that bridge to remove those causeways and prevent a repetition of the disaster that has befallen the city.

The resolution was agreed to.

NEW YORK CUSTOMS SERVICE.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate the rules of admission to the customs service at New York approved by the President March 6, 1879, and January 30, 1880, and such statement of the proceedings under the same as may show the practical effect of the operation of said rules upon the public service.

MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. PLATT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be instructed to inquire whether the practice of the Post-Office Department in letting contracts for the transportation of the mails to persons who, though the lowest bidders therefor, do not intend personally to perform such contracts, but make them solely for the purpose of speculation, is in accordance with public policy, and if not, what means can be devised to prevent the same, and report by bill or otherwise.

ADJUSTMENT OF PENSION APPLICATIONS.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I offer a substitute for the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] a few days ago, providing for the appointment of three Senators to sit during the recess of the Senate for the purpose of inquiring into the state of the law relative to the adjustment of pensions. I ask that it be printed, so that when the resolution is called up I may move it.

The substitute is as follows:

That a committee of three Senators be appointed by the Chair to sit during the recess of the Senate, with power to employ a stenographer, who shall also act as clerk, to send for persons and papers, administer oaths and examine witnesses, for the purpose of informing the Senate as to the defects of the present pension system, and the remedy therefor, with authority to report at the next session of the Senate, by bill or otherwise, what measures are necessary to prevent frauds and secure the early adjudication of all applications for pension.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed substitute will be printed and laid on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from West Virginia.

MORNING HOUR.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 155 may be taken up and considered at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will first ask the Senate to indicate the order of proceeding under the order by which the Senate now meets at eleven o'clock. At the last session the Journal records as follows:

The hour of half past twelve o'clock having arrived, the President pro tempore asked the Senate to place its construction upon the order of February 5, 1880, known as the "Anthony Rule," and submitted the following proposition: "Does the consideration of the Calendar continue until half past one o'clock, notwithstanding the change of the hour of meeting of the Senate?"

It was unanimously determined in the affirmative.

Shall that be the rule of the Senate for this session? As many as are in favor will say "ay;" opposed "no." [putting the question.] The ayes evidently have it; the ayes have it.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1830) granting a pension to Peter Grattan;

A bill (H. R. No. 1996) for the relief of W. A. Reid;

A bill (H. R. No. 4206) confirming and vesting the title to a certain tract of land in Burlington, Iowa, "in the independent school district" of said city;

A bill (H. R. No. 5832) for the relief of David W. Bell;

A bill (H. R. No. 5989) regulating the importation of raw materials to be manufactured in the United States and used in the construction and repair of vessels employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, or built for foreign account; and

A bill (H. R. No. 7030) regulating the pension of William Blaisdell.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 711) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 152) granting the use of artillery, tents, &c., to be used at the soldiers' reunion to be held at Lincoln, Nebraska, in the month of September of 1881.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 752) granting an increase of pension to Crafts J. Wright; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

DISTRICT MUNICIPAL CODE.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] whose rights will be reserved.

Mr. HARRIS. The further consideration of the resolution which I had the honor to report from the Committee on the District of Columbia, providing for the holding of night sessions for the consideration of the District code bill was postponed several days ago until to-day. I desire very much that the Senate should vote upon that resolution this morning; and all I desire to say is that unless night sessions are granted I am sure that in the present condition of the Senate the bill cannot be considered, and unless they are granted at once it will be wholly unnecessary to consider it, because if the bill shall be passed at a later day it will be impossible to enroll it. I hope the Senate will consent to vote upon the resolution this morning, and if the Senate votes it down I promise not to harass the ear of the Senate again by asking consideration of the same. I simply desire to test the sense of the Senate upon the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. As proposed to be amended by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE,] the resolution reads:

Resolved, That on and after Monday the 14th of February, 1881, the Senate will take a recess at —— o'clock p. m. and meet at seven and a half o'clock p. m. for the purpose of considering House bill No. 5541, entitled "An act to establish a municipal code for the District of Columbia," and will continue so to meet each day until the same shall have been finally acted upon by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution calls for the enactment of a special order, and will require a vote of two-thirds.

Mr. THURMAN. I only wish to occupy one minute's time to say that I do sincerely hope the Senate will not agree to the resolution. I do not believe that we ought to hold night sessions where we can avoid it.

Mr. KERNAN. Particularly when we meet at eleven.

Mr. THURMAN. When we meet at eleven o'clock particularly; nor do I believe it is possible to take up that voluminous bill and give it that careful consideration which it ought to receive, dealing as it does with a multitude of offenses and with various subjects of great importance to the people of this District at this session of Congress, when we have but a little more than two weeks to work. The bill ought to go over and be introduced and taken up at the next session of Congress, when there would be more time to consider it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I understand that the bill covers over three hundred pages.

Mr. HARRIS. Three hundred and thirty-five.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Amendments have been proposed to it, and some of the amendments relate to important subjects—compulsory education, the collection of the revenue, and licenses—that will lead to a very prolonged debate. I hope the Senate will be allowed to proceed to other and important urgent business.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Virginia will allow me, there are but three questions that will consume any time, but they may consume some time; it depends upon the temper of the Senate. All I ask is a vote of the Senate, and I shall cheerfully acquiesce in its judgment.

Mr. KERNAN. I think the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia has done his duty fully, but that we ought to take the responsibility of defeating the resolution; and to test that, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. KIRKWOOD and Mr. WHYTE addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York, to lay the resolution on the table, which is not debatable.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask the Senator from New York to withdraw his motion for a moment, and I shall renew it.

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly.

Mr. WHYTE. I should like to state to the Senate the condition of this bill.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will the Senator allow me to indicate an amendment I should like to move before he goes on?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It is to strike out all after the word "considering" in the clause "for the purpose of considering House bill No. 5541," &c., and to insert "the Calendar." That would give us night sessions, and give us the Calendar to work upon during those night sessions. I propose to move that amendment.

Mr. WHYTE. I cannot yield to the Senator from Iowa, because the Senator from New York has been kind enough to withdraw his motion to lay on the table to enable me to say a few words in regard to this resolution, when I will renew his motion.

Mr. President, I was about to say that this bill is not an ordinary bill introduced into Congress and passed by one House and then about to be acted upon by another branch of the legislative department, but the bill is a codification of laws now existing and being in operation in the District of Columbia, combined of general statutes of the United States, old local laws of Maryland which have been in operation for many years in the District, and special statute laws operating upon the District itself.

This codification is the result of the work of a commission appointed under an act of Congress, which was passed in 1878, creating the present form of government for the District of Columbia. It is therefore a digest or a code of many laws now in existence in this District, but scattered, some of them almost traditionary in their character, being old laws of Maryland that are brought into operation here on spasmodic occasions. This code was submitted by the commission so appointed as its work. It was examined in the House by a sub-committee appointed specially for that purpose, was reported away back a year ago in the House of Representatives, considered at night sessions in the House, deliberately considered, and it passed the House and came here in March, 1880. It was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate. That committee before the adjournment of Congress at its last session obtained authority from the Senate to sit during the recess, and it appointed a sub-committee, the honorable chairman of that committee being one and another Senator and myself acting as the sub-committee, and during the summer and fall we examined with great care this report of the code. We have made certain amendments to it, but there are very few of them. They can be explained to the Senate in a very short time. The great body of the work will give rise to no discussion at all. Much of it is mere detail work and can be passed through the Senate without objection from any quarter.

There are only two or three propositions, which can be discussed under a five-minute rule or certainly a ten-minute rule and disposed of. It is all-important that the great body of this bill should be disposed of immediately, and the few members who are interested in it I am sure would attend a night session and allow the bill to be passed so far as there is no objection, reserving for those Senators who desire to discuss other branches of the bill those portions of the bill for their discussion. But if the bill does not pass at this session the work has to be begun all over again next December; it has to be begun again in the House and run the ordeal of nearly three hundred members, and then to come back here and go through the same process of labor and toil for other Senators, when the work has been done by members of this body, perhaps not as intelligently as might have been done by others, but certainly as conscientiously as that duty could have been discharged by anybody. Our work will be vain; the work of the recess, the work of last fall, the work of this session, will all be lost unless the Senate is willing to give us one or two nights to dispose of the bill.

I renew the motion of the Senator from New York to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 35, noes 14.

EVENING SESSIONS FOR THE CALENDAR.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That on and after Tuesday, the 15th instant, the Senate will take a recess at —— and meet again at half past seven p. m. of the same day, to consider the cases on the Calendar, and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question, and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 5989) regulating the importation of raw materials to be manufactured in the United States and used in the construction and repair of vessels employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, or built for foreign account—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (H. R. No. 1830) granting a pension to Peter Grattan—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. No. 1996) for the relief of W. A. Reid—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 4206) confirming and vesting the title to a certain tract of land in Burlington, Iowa, "in the independent school district" of said city—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (H. R. No. 5832) for the relief of David W. Bell—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

A bill (H. R. No. 7030) regulating the pension of William Blaisdell—to the Committee on Pensions.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the standing order of the day.

Mr. WALLACE. I gave notice on Saturday at the adjournment that I should ask the Senate immediately on the conclusion of the morning business to-day to take up the Post-Office appropriation bill, and I now ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the pending order, being the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the standing order of the day, be postponed. The question is on the motion to postpone.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania now moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Before that motion is put, I should like——

Mr. WALLACE. Let the bill be taken up and I will yield the floor to the Senator temporarily.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The condition of things is this: I am exceedingly anxious to have the cattle-diseases bill get the right of way in the morning hour. It seems to me the proper mode would be, if it can be done, to take up the cattle-diseases bill in the morning hour, and then lay it aside informally, giving the appropriation bill the day.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I propose to move to take up the cattle-diseases bill as soon as I can get the floor.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask that the question be put on taking up the Post-Office appropriation bill. I am willing after that to yield the floor to the Senator from Iowa temporarily.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. But that does not give the cattle-diseases bill the right of way in the morning hour hereafter. That is what I want. I am perfectly willing that the Post-Office appropriation bill should take this day.

Mr. WALLACE. I cannot do that. The Senator must make his bargain with the Senate. I will yield the floor to him to make that motion after the Post-Office appropriation bill is up.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I hope, then, that the Senate will not take up that bill now, but will vote the motion down, and let us take the cattle-diseases bill up, and when that shall be taken up the gentlemen who are promoting that bill will consent that it be laid aside informally to go on with the appropriation bill, thus giving to that bill the whole day.

Mr. WALLACE. I cannot consent to any motion to postpone the consideration of this important appropriation bill. We have spent four days upon it now, and we are likely to run into the night with its consideration to-day, and therefore I trust the Senate will proceed with it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On the motion to proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill at this time the Senator from Iowa demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I hope the matter may be arranged in this way: I regard the cattle-diseases bill as so urgently important that I think it should be considered to the exclusion of all other matters, except appropriation bills. I propose to make a motion to lay aside or postpone the pending and all prior orders, with a view to proceed to the consideration of the cattle-diseases bill. If that motion should prevail, then I would yield to allow the Post-Office appropriation bill to go on to a conclusion, and at the conclusion of that the cattle-diseases bill would be the regular order. To carry out that programme, I move that the pending and all prior orders be postponed, intending to follow it up, if that should be agreed to, by allowing the Post-Office appropriation bill to go on, so that the cattle-diseases bill will be the regular order. I make that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That motion is not now in order. There is a motion already pending, which is that of the Senator from Pennsylvania, which must be disposed of first.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Virginia are laboring under a misapprehension as to the effect of the rule. They get no right of way during the morning hour. Suppose the cattle-diseases bill should be taken up now, it would fall with the morning hour, and have no right of way for to-morrow. There is no unfinished business during the morning hour. Therefore it appears to me that the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania ought to prevail. We should get rid of the appropriation bill, and then we can take up the funding bill or the cattle-diseases bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Virginia that, the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania failing, his motion will then be in order, and the Chair will recognize him for that purpose. But the pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the yeas and nays are to be taken I wish to say that I shall vote in the affirmative, because we have always found ourselves obliged and benefited in respect of standing to the understanding that the appropriation bills whenever they were ready should be first considered and all the time until they were disposed of. I know that it is now a little in advance of the time at which regularly under the rules the Post-Office appropriation bill would come up; but I think it would be a great advantage to the disposition of the business of the Senate if we did not have this space between the order for the introduction of resolutions and the unfinished business, for half of it is spent in doing exactly what I am doing now—in a discussion as to what shall be taken up. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania well conserves the time of the Senate by making his motion immediately after the introduction of bills, &c., is gone through with. Let us dispose of the Post-Office appropriation bill; then let us decide as rapidly as we can what we will take up next, and let us dispose of that before we do anything else, and if we stick to it we shall get more business done during this session than in any other way.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have but a word to say. I have felt it to be my duty to make this antagonism, if it shall be so called, in favor of the cattle-diseases bill. I shall feel that I have been utterly derelict to the people of the country in which I live if that bill shall fail for want of attention, and I shall feel that the public not only of that section but of the whole country have suffered injury that it will be very difficult to repair. I therefore seek to test the sense of the Senate upon the question whether or not it shall have preference.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely desire to remind the Senate that at the expiration of the morning hour, according to the notice given by me last Friday, I should ask for the consideration of the funding bill; but as this appropriation bill now stands I shall vote for the motion of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania to take it up, and shall then vote to continue it until it shall be finally disposed of; but immediately upon that disposition I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the funding bill, and to continue its consideration until it shall be concluded.

Mr. SAUNDERS. When the resolution was up providing for the meeting of the Senate at the hour of eleven o'clock instead of twelve, I voted for it and others did with the understanding that we were to have a longer time for the morning hour; and I understood that it had been decided that morning that we should have until half past one. I supposed then we were to have that time for the regular business of the Calendar. I am in favor, of course, of taking up the bill proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, but I want to put it off until we can get through the business of the morning hour and have the Calendar regularly taken up till half-past one o'clock, and then give the appropriation bill the rest of the day, and then take up the other bills indicated. I think we ought to settle it now, and settle it in favor of giving the hour after the morning business is done until half-past one o'clock to the Calendar. If we do not I do not see how we are to get through with it at all. I shall vote against the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania for the reason that I want to take the Calendar up until half past one o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 44, nays 12; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I give notice now that to-morrow, in the morning hour, when the regular morning business shall be through, I shall ask the Senate to take up and consider the bill I tried to get up this morning; and failing in that, I shall endeavor to take it up at the conclusion of the Post-Office appropriation bill. I consider it so urgent in importance that I shall push it with all the means in my power.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I suggest to the Senator from Virginia would it not be well to give notice of his intention to call up the cattle-diseases bill immediately on the conclusion of this appropriation bill?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have given that notice, and lest it should take all day I have mentioned the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It may be through this afternoon in time to make some progress to-day with the cattle-diseases bill.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to lay the pending amendment on the table.

Mr. MORRILL. When I made the motion to lay this amendment on the table, I had supposed the motion would only apply to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.] The Chair has, however, held that it would not only carry that amendment but the original amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I was anxious that the debate upon this bill should be concluded at an early day. If now I have the power to withdraw the motion to lay on the table I will do so, in order that we may get a direct vote upon the question of order.

Mr. INGALLS. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to the withdrawal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the motion cannot be withdrawn after the ordering of the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It can be withdrawn by the leave of the Senate. A majority can allow it to be withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is true. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] asks leave of the Senate to withdraw his motion. The question is on granting leave.

Leave was granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn. The question now is, Is the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in order?

Mr. MORGAN. On Saturday when I offered this amendment it was objected to by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] as not in order. The Chair submitted the question to the Senate. Then a motion was made to lay my amendment on the table. A vote was taken on that motion, when no quorum voted, and the yeas and nays were ordered. The point I make is that the Senate has taken jurisdiction of this amendment; it has been so far received as that a division was taken upon it, and then a call for the yeas and nays made upon it, and the call was sustained, and the Senate this morning released the amendment from the grasp of that call by consenting that the honorable Senator from Vermont might withdraw his motion to lay on the table. After by the consent of the Senate the case has reached that stage, I make the point that the question of order has been overruled by the Senate, and that it is not now in order to raise that question again. The Senate has acquiesced in dispensing with the consideration of the question of order made by the Senator from Pennsylvania in this manner, and I now maintain that the question of order is not open to be raised by any Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that upon the withdrawal of the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to table the amendment the question stands exactly as it did before he made the motion, and the question is now, if that view be correct, whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is in order or not. Is the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to the amendment proposed to the bill by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads in order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendment in question be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the following amendment proposed by Mr. MORGAN to be added to the amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

When vessels built in other countries are so accepted and employed, the same shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges secured by law to vessels built in the United States of America, except the privilege of engaging in the coastwise trade.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now let the amendment to which this is proposed as an amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. PUGH,] which has been decided to be in order.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 1, the amendment is to insert:

For additional postal service to foreign countries, $1,000,000, to be expended, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, in the establishment of mail-steamship lines, equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican-Gulf, and Pacific ports: Provided, That the vessels employed for such service shall be owned and manned by American citizens, and that said vessels thus employed shall be iron steamships, accepted by the Secretary of the Navy, after due inspection, as in all respects seaworthy and properly fitted to such service.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The pending question, if I understand it, is the question whether the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is in order under the rule about appropriation bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under Rule 29.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And am I right in supposing that the Senate has decided that the amendment of the Post-Office Committee is in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the decision of last Friday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, Mr. President, I shall feel compelled to vote that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is in order also, following the last judgment of the Senate, which I should vote to reconsider because until the vote was passed I thought it to be wrong. I think so still, as far as I am entitled to think so with respect to the deliberate judgment of the Senate on a question of order. But the Senate having decided, and not proposing to reconsider that decision, that it is in order to put on this bill a provision of an appropriation bill regulating the establishment of steamship lines by law and a suitable distribution of those lines between Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific ports, and providing a specific law as to the character, the ownership, the structure of those vessels, and so on, making a new law which regulates not merely the appropriation of this one million of money, but regulating the fact regarding these vessels, their structure, how they shall be employed, and so forth, it is impossible for me to say that an additional provision on the same subject and in the same line, prescribing other qualifications for vessels to be so employed, is not in order. To my mind it clearly is if the first one was, and the Senate has decided that it was.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to say a word?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think in the Senator's absence from the Senate he has not called to mind that he is not referring to the last decision of the Senate. The Senate did rule by its vote that the amendment presented originally by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] was in order. I submitted an amendment to it simply to define more specifically what was included in the amendment of the Senator from Texas, and the Senate ruled that out of order. Now I insist that the Senator from Vermont is not quoting from the last decision of the Senate; there was one subsequent to the one he has referred to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have been ill for two or three days and have not been in the Senate except for a very short time in the morning, and ought not to be here now, and so I was not advised in respect of the suggestion that the Senator from Maine makes. Inasmuch as I do not know what the precise character of the amendment of the Senator from Maine was, and do not know what the vote of the Senate was upon it, except as stated by my friend from Maine, no doubt correctly, I am unable to judge whether his amendment would fall within the suggestions I am endeavoring to make; and so I must leave that, as I am ignorant of it, to take care of itself. But certainly we have now before us two amendments, one which the Senate has declared to be in order, which, as I said before, makes a permanent, specific, legislative provision not controlling merely the disposition of the one million of dollars provided for, which might bring it nearer to the rule, but providing for a general establishment, with all the qualities that, if it were an independent bill without any appropriation at all, it should possess; the Senator from Alabama proposes to modify that establishment in the way indicated by his amendment. Now standing upon the fact that the amendment of the Senator from Texas is regularly before the Senate, then it seems to me, as I should have thought in the case of the Senator from Maine, to be almost trifling with a subject of this character to say that that amendment itself was not capable of being put into suitable shape. So, although I think the original amendment was clearly out of order, I shall vote to proceed to the consideration of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, and I say that without any reference to the merits of the amendment, which I do not at present choose to say anything about.

Mr. BAYARD. I am one of those who believed that the original amendment to which this is offered was out of order; but the Senate decided otherwise. I am equally clear in my judgment that the amendment of the honorable Senator from Alabama is in conflict with the rules of the Senate, and that it does propose a change in the features of the existing law upon an appropriation bill by way of amendment. What is it?

When vessels built in other countries are so accepted and employed, the same shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges secured by law to vessels built in the United States of America.

Can the laws securing privileges peculiarly to American-built and American owned vessels be extended to foreign-built and American-owned ships accepted for the purpose of mail carriage, without a change in existing law? It seems to me you have but to state the proposition to have it answer itself.

I suggested to my friend from Alabama, as I did in the original debate on the amendment of his colleague, or the amendment of the honorable Senator from Texas, what would be the effect of adding to the original amendment the words "according to the provisions of existing law." It would be undoubtedly to make that amendment clearly inoperative, and that struck me as being the crucial test whether or not existing laws were changed by proposing to confine the amendment and limit it to the provisions of existing law. If those additional words would render the amendment nugatory then it is clear that the amendment is out of order. If the words "according to the provisions of existing law" be added to the amendment which bears the name of the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] though offered by the honorable Senator from Alabama, [Mr. PUGH,] in my judgment it could never be carried into effect because there are no existing laws warranting it.

This amendment is going still further in the same direction. You are legislating anew; you are creating provisions of general law which do not now exist; and that you do, in my judgment, in defiance of Rules 28 and 29 of the Senate's code, by attempting by an amendment to change existing law on an appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise only to make a suggestion. I understand that now we are proceeding under the Anthony rule, which limits debate to five minutes by each Senator. We have occupied four or five days in discussing mere questions of order on this bill. I hope, as we are proceeding under that rule, that it will be enforced as to discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is in order?

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand we are not proceeding under the Anthony rule limiting debate to five minutes. That has been set aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those who are of opinion that the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama is in order will make it known by saying "ay;" those of the contrary opinion, "no," [putting the question.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAMPTON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 18, nays 32.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate decides that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is not in order. The question is on the amendment offered by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MORGAN. In line 7, before the word "iron," I propose to insert the words "steel or."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that in order? It changes the character of this amendment decidedly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment again.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 7, before the word "iron," it is proposed to insert "steel or;" so as to read "and that said vessels thus employed shall be steel or iron steamships."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hold that it is in order; but will submit it to the judgment of the Senate, if it be desired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is in order, but I think it is contrary to the last vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire that the judgment of the Senate shall be expressed upon it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I think the Chair has decided it right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the amendment.

Mr. FERRY. I object to it if the word "steel" is out of order. I would prefer to say "steel and iron" rather than "steel or iron."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I now move to strike out the word "owned" in line 6 and insert "officered" in lieu thereof; so as to read:

Provided, That the vessels employed for such service shall be officered and manned by American citizens.

Mr. WALLACE. I rise to inquire whether the effect of this amendment is not precisely to put into the original proposition that which the Senate has just now by a yea-and-nay vote declared to be out of order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania make the point of order?

Mr. WALLACE. I do. It is the same amendment just ruled out of order by a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. MORGAN. I take the liberty of saying that the point of order is a very singular one to come in at this stage of the proceeding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair submits the question of order to the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. By the last vote we have made an amendment by which we enlarge the amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads so as to include steel as well as iron steamships. The amendment proposed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads does change the existing state of the law, I think not inappropriately, not improperly, not in violation of the rules of the Senate. The Senator from Vermont differs from me in that respect; but surely it is within the power of the Senate to modify this amendment, at least to make it more clearly in conformity with existing statutes. The laws at present authorize the Postmaster-General to make contracts for carrying the mails abroad either with American-built ships or foreign-built ships, American-owned ships or foreign-owned ships, American-officered ships or foreign-officered ships, and the amendment which I now propose brings the amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads more nearly to that standard of the law which exists on the statute-book at this moment. This amendment of the committee changes that by saying that the ships shall be owned only by Americans. My amendment strikes out "owned" and substitutes "officered," so as to require not that they shall be owned here, but that they shall be officered and manned by American citizens, so that we are approaching more nearly, if we adopt my amendment, the existing state of the law.

Now, what objection can there be to amending an appropriation of the kind proposed by the Committee on Appropriations in the following words: "For transporting the foreign mails, $225,000," by saying that these foreign mails shall be carried under existing law, or by saying nothing about it and allowing them to be carried under existing law? The Postmaster-General can use that $225,000 that we are now appropriating under existing statutes by employing ships owned entirely abroad, manned by foreigners, officered by foreigners, for the transportation of our mails. The committee's amendment proposes that they shall not be owned abroad in reference to this addition to the service, but that they shall be owned at home. I move to strike out that provision in order that the Postmaster-General may be left as free in the application of this million dollars as the statutes leave him at this time in the employment of the regular appropriation in the bill upon foreign-owned ships, foreign-built ships, and foreign-officered ships. I should like to hear some Senator, particularly of that class who are exceedingly scrupulous about the amendment being within the rules of order of the Senate, explain why it is not. I should like to hear the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania explain why it is that the striking out of the word "owned" in the amendment which has been accepted by the Senate as being in order should put the amendment out of order when the amendment that I propose to the amendment of the committee only places the power of the Postmaster-General to employ these ships exactly where it stands by the existing law.

I desire that in the expenditure of this million dollars the Postmaster-General shall have the same liberty that he has under the existing statutes and no more. I am willing to have more to the extent that the steamships employed under this additional appropriation shall be officered and manned by American citizens. I would be glad that we could have ships built abroad, owned by American citizens and entitled to the privileges of American registry; but as we cannot get them now in that position, I want at least, if the ships are owned in part by Americans and in part by foreigners, that the Postmaster-General shall have the privilege, as he has now, of having the mails under contract with the Post-Office Department carried in vessels built and owned abroad, but officered by American citizens.

Mr. MAXEY. The object which I had in view was to encourage American ownership of steamships adapted to carrying the mails. The striking out of the word "owned," as proposed by the Senator from Alabama, and the insertion of the word "officered," revolutionizes the entire theory of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

So much for that. One other point I desire to make as to my own action. So far as I am concerned, I reported the amendment in good faith, believing it a wise measure in the interest of American shipping to encourage the purchase of vessels, built anywhere, by American citizens, to be manned by Americans and registered as American vessels. The voting down by the Senate of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is very clear notice to me at least that after the passage of the amendment offered by the Post-Office Committee such vessels shall not be registered for any purpose here, and hence the usefulness of it is destroyed. I have received that notice and shall act on it.

Mr. WALLACE. It is evident from what the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Alabama have said that the amendment of the Senator from Texas is committed to me, which, I would say, sends it to a nurse that loves it not; and in view of the fact that we can better settle this question and get the sense of the Senate as to whether they are disposed to continue the word "owned" by a direct vote upon the proposition than in any other way, I withdraw the point of order and will ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I renew the point of order, Mr. President. I should like to have the Senate decide whether that amendment is in order or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is the amendment proposed now by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6 of the amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads it is proposed to strike out the word "owned" and insert the word "officered."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is whether this amendment is in order, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired on every question of order as well as of merits with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] who is unable to be in his seat. Therefore I cannot vote.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 14, nays 31; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate decides that the amendment to the amendment is not in order. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BUTLER. I gave notice some days ago of an amendment to the amendment which I now offer. In line 5, after the word "ports," I move to insert "in proportion to the annual value of the exports from said ports to foreign countries."

Mr. WHYTE. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina to explain the effect of that amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. The effect of it will be to divide these lines between the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific ports in proportion to the value of exports from those ports.

Mr. WHYTE. What will be the effect?

Mr. BUTLER. The effect will be that the respective ports will get their share of this money, I suppose. I simply offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the question if the point of order is made upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont makes the point that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina is not in order. The Chair submits that question to the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Vermont be kind enough to explain in what respect it is not in order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is legislation like the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no legislation about this; it is simply directing how this fund shall be distributed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not say how this million dollars shall be used; it says how the steamships shall be distributed, and there is some difference between three distinct lines of steamships and a million dollars, inasmuch as each steamship will cost nearly a million itself if you have only one to a port.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is whether the amendment now submitted by the Senator from South Carolina is in order? As many as are of opinion that the amendment is in order will make it known by saying "ay;" those of a contrary opinion "no," [putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. HAMPTON. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

The roll-call was concluded, with the following result:

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire to ask consent to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BRUCE] and voted inadvertently. If it makes no difference in the result, I ask leave to withdraw the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote cannot be withdrawn. The Senate decides that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why may not the Senator from Minnesota withdraw his vote? The result has not been finally announced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks consent to withdraw his vote.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BRUCE] has come in since I made the request. I withdraw my request if he wishes to vote.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask that my name be recorded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota withdrawing his vote, the result is yeas 16, nays 23. The amendment is decided to be out of order. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I believed the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] was not in order under the rules of the Senate. Otherwise I should have been disposed to vote for it, although had the original amendment prevailed I should not support the proposition as amended.

I do not propose at this stage of the session to consider at any length the present condition of the American carrying trade on the high seas, and what methods are legitimate and wise and sanctioned by the limitations of our Constitution of government for improving the facilities for the transportation of merchandise, of freight and passengers, and of general commercial intercourse between our own and foreign countries in American-built ships. I will say but this: it is a branch of industry scarcely second to any in national importance. The great element which covers the greater portion of the globe's surface is certainly well worthy consideration. It is a topic carefully to be considered in the light of history, and philosophy. It is world-wide and international in the simplest and strongest sense; and at this time there are few subjects that demand more study from those who are intrusted with the legislation of this Government.

This amendment does unquestionably touch that great question. It is the commencement of a proposed system of Government assistance to the transportation of merchandise between this and foreign countries. It is under cover of a postal system, that the real object of the measure is, I will not say concealed, but under which it lies thinly veiled from observation; and the amendment itself with much frankness discloses the real object by declaring that a million dollars is to be appropriated during the present year for "the establishment of steamship lines by the Postmaster-General to be equitably distributed between the Atlantic, Mexican-Gulf, and Pacific ports." Plainly this is a proposition that the Government of the United States shall become a trader, establish steamship lines for all the purposes for which ships are designed, Government lines for postal convenience, for the transportation of freight and passengers, and for all else that steamship lines are created. Into that business the Government of the United States is proposing to embark, and it is suggested that this is to be an assistance to the ship-builders of the country; artisans who have made the building of ships the study and occupation of their lives and are supposed, in some way not clear to my mind, to be benefited by this proposition.

Now, in two words, what does it mean? It means that the Government is to come in competition with the great body of ship-builders and ship-owners of the United States. It means that when I or any other man who has embarked his capital and skill in the construction and maintenance of steamships, has set his all upon the hazard of the die, he is to find himself in competition, with whom? With the Treasury of his own Government, that those who are the favorites of the postal Department, or of the Executive, or of Congress are to be protected and paid and fostered and capital furnished them free of cost to compete with all other citizens embarking in the same business. If this be not protection or subsidy in the worst sense it is well for us to understand it.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Delaware if the statutes as they now exist do not furnish full and unqualified opportunity to select between foreign-owned and foreign-built ships and American-owned and American-built ships for the transportation of the mails, and whether the $225,000 appropriated in this bill may not all of it be employed by the Postmaster-General at his own option in giving bounties, if he choose to give bounties, to British steamships or to steamships of any other country in the transportation of the mails?

Mr. BAYARD. My friend will pardon me if I do not stop just now to answer his question but continue the line of objection based on principle to legislation of this kind. There is a familiar doctrine found in the Constitution of the United States and in the constitution of every State, which is the necessary outgrowth of the institution of government itself. It is that the interest of the individual or of the few must give way to that of society at large. Therefore private property may be taken for public use upon just compensation being rendered. In that way a man may be deprived of property of any description however convenient or dear to him or hallowed by association, provided compensation adjudged by a public tribunal shall be paid him for the deprivation. But where is the proposition and where in any civilized government called free can you find the doctrine recognized that public property may be taken for private use? And yet what does this measure before us amount to? What is your subsidy after all, stripped of all its disguises, but that you do take public property for private use when you dip your hand in the Treasury under authority of this amendment and take a million dollars out to be given to A, and A alone, to aid and encourage him in his private undertaking and not to the other citizens of this country who may be engaged as meritoriously and zealously in the same branch of industry and enterprise?

I have among my constituents individuals and associated bodies of men who have been industriously engaged for as long a time, as skillfully and as successfully in the construction of iron steamships and wooden vessels of a superior class as any in the United States. I have carefully studied their interests; I am keenly alive to whatever affects them. They can build and furnish to any purchaser to-day as well-constructed, staunch, swift, seaworthy, and valuable iron steamers and wooden vessels as can any builders in the world, and their work has proved it in the Gulf of Mexico and on the Pacific. Few and distant are seas which the keels of their vessels have not vexed, and their work has stood the test of time and trial, and to-day they are prepared to execute the largest order for the best class of iron steamships. Therefore it might be supposed that my desire to serve these men, of whose interests I have personal knowledge, with whose success I have the strongest personal and local sympathy, would control me in sustaining a proposition of this kind, for they might possibly be among those likely to be applicants for this Government bounty; but I can see perfectly well that the supposed advantage is illusory and the principle which attends it false; it is the doctrine of taking public property from the common Treasury for private use; and it cannot be sustained, and the more you examine it the more its dangers and injustice reveal themselves.

I tell you, Senators, that, stripped of its disguises, the doctrine of subsidy and the doctrine of taking public property for private use grow from the same soil, and in principle cannot be distinguished one from the other. I can imagine no more dangerous and fatal principle in a popular government than to open the public treasury to the assaults of organized parties, each seeing how much they can obtain for local, sectional, personal, or class interests. The political party with which I have acted ever since I had a right to take part in the politics of the country have been for that doctrine of "hands off" by the Government in matters of individual enterprise and industry. It was a rule of action, safe, simple, and just to all, and gave no advantages to favored individuals or classes, and under it our country grew strong and gradually outstripped competitors. But now it is proposed to be abandoned, and, instead of justice to all and favor to none, the party or the section that can control most votes in Congress can carry away the most money from the Treasury; it is to be the rule of the strongest and the richest, and when it has been admitted the sun of that day will set upon the bankruptcy of our country and it will set upon the farewell of the honesty of the American people. It is a system corrupt and corrupting, and therefore it is that in all stages and at all times I oppose the principle of taking public property for private use, under the forms of legislation and the specious garb of assistance to the commerce and industries of our country.

It is an unjust perversion of the taxes wrung from the toil of our people, whose best and surest relief will be found in allowing these taxes to remain in the pockets whence they were taken by unwise and unnecessary laws.

As I said, there is no time for me now, nor am I prepared at this moment to enter upon the broad question of relief to the great business of American ship-building, and the regaining of our position as carriers upon the high seas. I know that there exist to-day burdens in the shape of local taxation, port charges, head-money, all sorts of exactions, which ought to be taken off the shipping interests. I know there is a system of fees, exactions, and charges which oppress shipping at the hands of the United States Government, and I propose to set on foot ascertainment of those charges, to be laid before Congress that they may see where legitimate relief can be given. I know that ship-owners and ship-builders are burdened by another class of exactions in the shape of the required use of patented articles, which they are compelled to purchase and employ in the construction of their ships and to carry with them on their voyages, and for which they must pay such royalty as the patentee chooses to demand. I also know that there is a system of tariff taxation upon the materials of which ships are built in this country, an average of more than 40 per cent., which places them at a disadvantage upon the common highway of nations in competition with ship-owners and builders whose materials were burdened with no such taxes.

These are but some of the facts which, together with many others that I have not time now to mention to the Senate, call for examination that we may apply legitimate relief to this great industry, by taking from it burdens unwisely imposed in time of war, and still more unwisely continued when all pretext for their existence has long since passed away.

But as to this proposition of fostering certain steamship lines by special grants of money from the public Treasury, I consider it utterly unwarranted and unwholesome not only to the immediate recipients of the money, but utterly unjust to all those to whom such bounty is denied. I say it would be a hard thing for an American ship-builder, ship-master, or ship-owner, endeavoring by industry, skill, and persistence to succeed in a given line of travel on the ocean, to find himself driven from the business by the Treasury of his own Government, under the control of some fortunate competitor and successful combiner of political influence.

Therefore it is, sir, that I trust this amendment will not prevail. I say nothing now of its being ingrafted upon an appropriation bill. Irregular as I thought that was, I bow of course to the decision of the Senate; but upon the principle which underlies this amendment, the doctrine of subsidy, the doctrine of taking the public money for a private use under cover, as these things always are under cover, of something that is meritorious and desirable in the abstract, I trust the proposition will not receive the assent of the Senate.

I listened the other day with great respect and interest to the elaborate presentation of this shipping question by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] Much that he said was true; many of his deductions I concurred in; in others I did not. Still his speech was a contribution of value to a great and important subject. My friend from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] in my absence on Saturday, also considered this question ably and intelligently. I am sorry that I had not the pleasure of hearing what he had to say, but shall hereafter read it carefully. I hope to see, not this Congress, for I think we cannot move in this matter in so brief a space of time as is left, but the next Congress, soon adopt a well-considered system based upon all the facts of the case, and, what the Senate has not yet had, full knowledge of the facts of the case—a well-considered system whereby the trammels which unwise taxation has placed upon the ship-building interest of the United States, and the varied industries which are connected with it, will wisely be relieved.

I believe to-day in two words that this great business of ship-building is not profitable, or capital would more freely flow into it; and if it be not profitable it is because the taxation upon it makes profit so small that capital can be better employed elsewhere; and if I am right in this respect, that it is the superincumbent weight of excessive taxation that has paralyzed, and to-day does trammel, this great branch of national industry, both in the labor and materials needed, how is it to be relieved by expending money derived only from taxation that shall make that burden only greater than it was before? The more money you so appropriate the greater must be the tax. Every dollar that enters the Treasury is brought there by taxation, and you cannot pluck one industry of this country out and sever it from the rest and consider it alone. All must be subjected to the same broad scheme of adjustment and equitable distribution of the public burdens. Therefore, I say, it is no cure for overtaxation to increase the burdens of taxation, and this is what this measure proposes, to take from the many to give to one or a few. There is no justice in that. For my own part I believe that the great law of human interest and the great principle that enables men to be happier and more successful in government, is where there is less interference by government with the affairs and business and contracts of individuals. I believe greater relief will come by amending an unwise system of interference in the shape of existing tariffs and taxes and interferences with the contracts of individuals than there would be in taking unjustly a large sum of money from the public Treasury and giving it to one or a few upon a principle which in a popular government, to my mind, is dangerous in the last degree.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not like, after I have been engaged during all the time this debate has been pending in an effort to get rid of every feature of this amendment which might look like a subsidy, to have it supposed by the honorable Senator from Delaware that either myself or any other Senator desires to take money out of the Treasury of the United States to devote it to a private purpose, or that we are any more ready to violate the established rules of the democratic party than he is upon a proposition of this kind. The Senator philosophizes splendidly upon this subject as he does upon all subjects, but I submit to him that his philosophy is far above the facts in the case and has no real application to the condition of the country in reference to its legislation on the important subject of the transmission of the mail.

The Senator is opposed, he says, to taking a million dollars out of the Treasury and applying it to steamship lines for the purpose of paying for the transit of the mails across the ocean. We find, however, that there is a law upon the statute-book, and has been for a number of years, by which the Postmaster-General is authorized and required to employ steamships to transmit the mails; but there is a limitation upon these statutes to this effect: that he can only pay to those steamships a sum equivalent to the sea-postage as might be realized upon the particular line. If it has been unjust, undemocratic, and wrong for so many years to apply any money whatsoever out of the Treasury of the United States to steamship lines for carrying the mails, it astonishes me that the alert and active democrat who represents so capably the State of Delaware has not before discovered it. We have been taking out of the Treasury of the United States and paying for mails carried between New York and Liverpool and New York and Havre and various places annually a contribution of money, which has been paid sometimes to American lines and sometimes to foreign lines, for the purpose of transmitting the mails. We never have supposed that we got anything else than an equivalent for all the money we expended in the service rendered to commerce as well as the convenience of the people of the United States under this system.

Now, I will take the southwest, and I will take the border; and I will suppose that the Congress of the United States in order to prevent the taking of any money improperly out of the Treasury of the United States should say to those gentlemen who are mail contractors upon the great lines reaching out into the Territories, and to the frontiers of our country, "you must not expect anything out of the Treasury of the United States in the way of contribution to the mail lines you establish there except the postages that you realize upon those lines." Suppose that that had been the policy of this Government from its foundation to the present time, what would have happened? A mail line on such a basis as that would not have got as far west as Cincinnati in Ohio by this time. The mail contractors in the poor, thinly settled sections of the United States are encouraged to carry the mails so as to distribute them largely to the scattered population by what the honorable Senator from Delaware would call a subsidy, an amount of money paid out of the Treasury of the United States to pay for the value of the service, which value of service to him far exceeds the public return that he makes by transmitting the letters in a stage-coach on public road or on the back of a horse.

The honorable Senator seems to be incapable of comprehending the idea embodied in this proposition, if I understand him aright. The idea involved is not the building up of American commerce or an American merchant marine, but it is to extend the postal facilities of the United States across the ocean to other countries. We know perfectly well that we have had to resort, under our postal system, to the compulsory law that no American ship should have a clearance from one of our ports unless she agreed to carry the mails and deliver them within three hours after her landing at a foreign port, in order to have our mails carried. We take the ships built by private citizens, and owned by private citizens under the flag of the United States, and we deny to them a clearance from our harbors unless they will consent to take the mails of the United States for the postage money, and deliver them within three hours after their arrival at a foreign port. It seems to me that when we consider the view of the law that has just been presented, and which is exactly in conformity with the statute, we are violating the Constitution in the wrong direction, for we are taking private labor and private property owned by the owner of a ship, and we are confiscating or condemning it to public use without making a satisfactory compensation. Who does not know that $225,000 is an inadequate sum to transport our mails legitimately across the ocean? We are spending now $30,000,000 a year for the transportation of mails overland through this country, and yet it is supposed that $225,000 is all the money that the Senate of the United States ought to vote to have the mails carried across the ocean.

Sir, if we are violating constitutional rights and democratic usages and doctrines, it is in the direction of compelling men to render service to this country without just compensation, rather than we shall be violating them by putting in an amendment to this bill which looks to the idea of giving them something like a just compensation.

I say—and no Senator on this floor I think will deny it—that $225,000 is a totally inadequate sum to pay men a just compensation for carrying these mails. We propose to increase it to $1,225,000, in the hope thereby of stimulating intercourse between our country and abroad. If commerce chooses to follow the track of the mails, let commerce thus follow. We have no mails established in this country from which that view of the subject is shut out. We have not a mail in the United States to-day that is not more or less directly connected with the idea that it is a pioneer or an assistant in carrying commerce into the frontiers and the unsettled portions of our country, or furnishing facilities for commerce between those portions which are more densely populated. You cannot disconnect the two ideas. Commerce and the mails go together as naturally as electricity and the copper wire go together to transmit messages across the continent. Commerce without mails would be of no value to this country, and mails without commerce would be almost useless. They are wedded together in the Constitution and in public experience and in private experience, so that you cannot separate one of them without doing injustice to both.

Then if we do expend a million dollars more than we are doing with a view of trying to compensate the men who are carrying the mails, and if they must carry them in steamships, the vehicles which also transport commerce and thereby create commerce as well as intercourse between this and foreign countries, where is the principle of the democratic party violated in that, and where is the clause of the Constitution of the United States that is violated? No, sir; it is easy enough to decry a measure by pointing to it the finger of scorn, and saying you are trying to create a subsidy; but it is much more difficult to prove by argument that there is any subsidy in this measure or connected with it. The only subsidy that is hinted at in this measure at all is in virtue of the fact that the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Texas requires that the ship employed for this purpose shall be owned, officered, and manned by citizens of the United States. It may be that in our poor condition in reference to steamships that would amount to a subsidy in favor of those twenty-five or twenty-six gentlemen or companies who happen to own steamships in the United States, for I believe there are only about twenty-five or twenty-six of them. That is the only view that looks in the direction of subsidy in this measure. I have been trying all I could to modify that view by providing that ships when bought abroad should be entitled to an American registry. The Senate has voted contrary to its own decision every fifteen minutes; it has voted down that amendment, and yet it has voted in favor of others that are quite as violative of existing law or quite as suggestive of new legislation as that was. I make no complaint of that. I have no right here except to express my own opinion and give my own vote. That is as far as I go. If I do not succeed it is nobody's loss but mine. But it is time that the Senate of the United States had looked at this question in a broader light than that taken by the honorable Senator from Delaware; it is time that the Senate of the United States had taken into its consideration the question whether we are furnishing proper mail facilities between this and foreign countries. If you will encourage men by paying them a fair and just compensation for taking the mails to sail out of the port of Mobile, or the port of New Orleans, or the port of Charleston, or the port of Baltimore, or elsewhere along our great sea-coast, or from a port on the Pacific Ocean, you will do your country good; every man, woman, and child in this country will be benefited, because it will increase those resources of commerce, which, when increased and distributed, will distribute the burden of taxation, will give relief to every man, woman, and child in the country.

I do not know any measure more broad and catholic in its effect than this. I cannot conceive of one which is more just in its operation. It seems to me that the arguments which have been made here are not only contrary to the true policy of this Government, but they are put upon grounds that are too narrow for us to stand on.

I call the attention of the Senate to this statute, and I called the attention of the honorable Senator from Delaware to it while he was on the floor, but he did not choose to reply to my remark:

SEC. 4008. The mail between the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the United States touching at a foreign port, shall be transported in steamships; but the Postmaster-General may have such transportation performed by sailing-vessels when the service can be facilitated thereby.

The mails "shall be transported in steamships;" and under this statute the Postmaster-General has the option to say whether they shall be foreign-owned and foreign-built ships or native-owned and native-built ships. Then the law is broad enough in that direction, and I am entirely willing, so far as I am concerned, to let it stand right there; but the amount of supplies we furnish to the Postmaster-General to enable him to carry on postal service with foreign countries is not sufficient. Some honorable Senator said on Saturday when this question was up—I believe it was the Senator who has charge of the bill—that the Postmaster-General had not made a request for more than $225,000 for this service. That is very true, because the existing law confined him to the amount of money that might be earned in sea postages as the rate of compensation that shall be supplied to ships to carry our letters abroad and bring them home again, and the Postmaster-General is confined by law in making his estimates to existing statutes. Hence he could not estimate for more than $225,000. But who is authorized on this floor to say that the Postmaster-General, if he had the right to speak for the United States and define the policy of this country, would ever undertake to assert that more than $225,000 could not be reasonably employed in stimulating mail intercommunication with foreign countries? That part of the subject he has not touched, because the statute shuts him off from any right to touch it. But, sir, it is our duty to touch it, and to do it on an appropriation bill; that is the very place to do it.

I am willing to make the appropriation large enough to enable the Postmaster-General to increase our mail facilities with foreign countries, and leave him to expend the money precisely as he can under existing statutes. The amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Texas is a restrictive amendment, not new, not general in its character. It restrains the expenditure of the money to steamships—iron steamships, or steel or iron—now since the adoption of the amendment I offered. It restrains the expenditure of the money to such ships as these, instead of allowing it to be employed in wooden steamships and steamships owned and manned by foreigners. I would prefer myself to strike out the proviso in the amendment; but it was supposed that perhaps there were Senators on this floor who would very much prefer that that proviso to the amendment should stay there; who would very much prefer that in giving support to our foreign mail service those who had ships built in the United States, and officered and manned by citizens of the United States, might have a preference over those who had ships built and officered and manned abroad.

Now, Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate, and from this body the attention of the country, again to this amendment. Senators declaim here against subsidy, and yet on Saturday I pointed out how in the proviso, to the very section to which this proposition of the Senator from Texas is an amendment, there is a positive and explicit subsidy, a subsidy of $45,000 given in the bill, and given, too, in aid of the colonial legislation of two foreign colonies. Senators make no complaint of that. That suits them well enough. There is no invasion of democratic platforms in that. Here is a committee, the majority of whom are democrats, that bring in without question a subsidy passed by the House of Representatives, and no clearer subsidy was ever put into a bill in the world. I shall vote for the bill with that in it, because I do not believe that the efforts we are making to compensate these transporters of the mails in that particular case is going to do any harm to this country. I do not believe it establishes any general and pernicious doctrine in the laws of this country. It is a specific measure intended to apply to a specific subject, and to remedy an existing grievance. That is all, and so I shall vote for the bill with that subsidy in it, with the indorsement of a democratic House, a democratic Senate, and a democratic committee. And while I do that I do not like Senators to get up here and charge me with a disposition to subsidize men because they own American-built ships. Let Senators come to the true test of the question and vote against that measure, and strike it out if it be not in accordance with democratic doctrine; but if they do not do that, let them cease to talk about the matter when they prove by their own votes that they cannot be very earnest, active, or energetic in the enforcement of their views in the Senate.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I voted this morning and I urged the Senate with all the earnestness of which I was capable to hold night sessions to discharge our duty as I supposed in the passage of needful legislation. I indicated, therefore, my willingness, at much inconvenience, probably at more inconvenience to myself than to most Senators, to remain here during the evening and expedite as far as possible the business which presses us at the close of this session of Congress. Therefore I have no apologies to make if I shall detain the Senate a little while in entering again, as I have done on former occasions, my earnest and zealous protest against legislation such as is contained in this amendment offered by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The Senator from Alabama who has longest held a seat on this floor of the two Senators from that State [Mr. MORGAN] has sought by a specious argument, if he will allow me to say so without offense, to change the character of this amendment from what it really is to what he would have it seem to be. The object of the amendment, as declared by the junior Senator from Alabama, [Mr. PUGH,] who offered it as the organ of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, was to build up again our foreign commerce; and before he came to this as a remedy, in the clearest, in the most concise, and in the strongest manner he portrayed the decadence of American commerce on the high seas; he gave us facts that were irresistible; he gave us deductions of logic that I admired and concurred in; he painted us a picture of our fall in the rank of nations as a commercial power. I agreed with all this; I concurred with him in most of his conclusions; but I must confess I was startled when I found him maintaining that this amendment was a remedy for the evils which he had portrayed.

Mr. PUGH. Will my friend allow me a word?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. PUGH. I think my friend, the Senator from Maryland, may have misunderstood me. I stated that I had no hope whatever of beneficial results from such legislation as he condemns, but that I favored an appropriation for carrying the mail in ships owned exclusively by American citizens and purchased in the cheapest markets; and I put my support of the appropriation upon precisely the same grounds so fully indicated in the argument just made by my colleague, that it was nothing but just compensation for the use of private property employed in the public service. That is precisely the ground I occupied, and I had no idea of relying upon this as a remedy for the restoration of our lost trade on the sea.

Mr. WHYTE. The Senator from Alabama misunderstands me; I have not misunderstood him; on the contrary, I listened with the greatest pleasure to his argument as he delivered it here the other day, and I was so enamored of it that I have read it over twice since, and my admiration is lost in wonder that it did conclude in so specious a fallacy. That is the difficulty of it. I looked upon it as a splendid argument. It was brilliant in its character; but it was like so many of those minerals which are discovered by geologists which present the most brilliant crystal on top and at the bottom you see some bug, which in the management of nature has been left within it. So in this case, take away this last conclusion, take away this substitute for a real remedy from his speech, and it shines like a diamond; and I would follow him in any measure which would enact into law the conclusions which he drew until he came to this last one as the best under the circumstances he could obtain. I think, Mr. President, it is the very worst.

Mr. MORGAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. What was the last conclusion?

Mr. WHYTE. That, as he could not get what would be a remedy for these evils, he would take the amendment of the Post-Office Committee.

Mr. MORGAN. My colleague said the other day, as I understood him, that he was not in favor of this amendment unless it authorized the use of vessels owned by American citizens though they might be built abroad.

Mr. WHYTE. There is a fallacy. Can any American buy a ship abroad now and run it under this measure? Will the honorable Senator from Alabama answer me that question?

Mr. PUGH. I think he can under this measure.

Mr. WHYTE. In spite of the navigation laws of this country?

Mr. PUGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHYTE. No, Mr. President, "that won't do," as the honorable Senator from Ohio would say. These arguments are fallacious. They are not practical. They may deceive some, but they do not deceive me.

Mr. PUGH. Will my friend yield?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly, I will yield.

Mr. PUGH. I desire, so that there shall be no mistake as to what I said, to read exactly what I did say:

> But I am willing to favor liberal compensation for ocean mail service, and place it on terms of equality with our overland mail service by railroads. I doubt very much whether compensation for mail service, however liberal, will produce any largely beneficial results. I have no idea such inconsiderable aid would enable merchants and capitalists who wish to engage in our ocean carrying trade with other countries to compete with the cheaper built and comparatively untaxed and unencumbered ships of England. As John Roach says, we must go to the root of the evil, and in my poor judgment the only way to do so is to legislate as I have proposed.

In that proposed legislation I understand the Senator and myself fully agree.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I do agree that we should go to the root of the evil, and that is why I say that the honorable Senator from Alabama's argument is fallacious when he supposes that this will correct in any way the evil, or that it is not open to great objection. That is precisely what I say.

Mr. PUGH. If my friend will allow me, I will say that there is a very narrow margin between him and myself on this subject. I might say that I fully concur with him that this is an attempt to sail a kite in a storm.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I was complimenting the honorable Senator from Alabama for the manner in which he had presented the fact to the Senate and to the country of the great decay in American commerce. I say that he made it so that it was too plain to be disputed. Indeed it seems to be a concession on all hands that it had gone to the bottom, as low as the nation ought to permit the decay of commerce to go so far as it is within its power to remedy it, and that therefore it is our duty to consider the question. The honorable Senator from Alabama presented it in one way; the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] presented it in another way, in his own way as clearly as possible, and the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] also presented the same question. We all agree that our commerce on the high seas has gone down to the very lowest point that as a nation we should permit it to go. How to cure the evil, how to remedy this great trouble, is a problem of statesmanship that requires care and thought and the most serious consideration of those who are willing to give days of deliberation and nights of toil in discovering a proper remedy for it. It is no child's play, Mr. President. We know that the commerce of our country has been growing "fine by degrees and beautifully less" ever since 1855. We know that, and then as a remedy for it the Post-Office Committee undertakes to devise some scheme which will restore to us our commerce.

Why, Mr. President, that is not the committee to whom appropriately belongs the subject. That is not the doctor to give an opinion or to prescribe remedies for any such disease. Their prescription is a mere quack medicine and will do no more good than if they recommended a box of Brandreth's pills or a case of Plantation Bitters. The Committee on Finance, the Committee on Ways and Means, is the proper committee to wrestle with this subject. That is the committee to whom should be confided the great work of lifting from the bottom of the ocean our American commerce to its surface and bid it float once more again and carry our flag as in former times it did into every port on the habitable globe.

Ah, but says the honorable Senator from Alabama, "this is to increase our postal service; this is not subsidy." Call it by any other name it would smell more sweetly than it does called by that name: and the honorable Senator from Alabama calls it "postal facilities." Who is complaining of postal facilities? Where are your memorials which American citizens when they are interested in any subject send to our table here by the car-load? The right of petition is not only known to belong to an American, but he exercises it early and often. And where are these clamoring multitudes who have no postal facilities, who cannot communicate with their foreign correspondence; who cannot communicate perchance with "the girl they left behind them" in the old country and elsewhere? Are they here complaining of a lack of postal facilities? Where is the country whither our mails do not go and to which our people clamor that they ought to go? I have heard no such voice. Where is the chief executive officer of the postal department of this Government? Has he come to our door, or sent his message, or his letter, or memorial asking us to give further authority to increase the postal facilities of the country? No, Mr. President; that plea for this subsidy will not do; it deceives nobody. If I may be permitted in this august presence to relate an anecdote: I remember the story of the boy who was sent to a doctor's office to bring the doctor to a sick family, and the doctor being engaged he was shown into the back room, and, with the inquisitiveness of boys, opened the closet-door, and there found the doctor's skeleton. He at once rushed from the office across the street; the doctor followed him shortly and begged the boy to come back, calling him from the opposite side and telling him to come in, it was all right. "Oh no," said the boy, "you can't fool me; it's the same old skeleton, only it has got its clothes on." So it is now; it is "subsidy" dressed in the guise of "postal facilities."

Ah, Mr. President, we were asked two years ago to increase the postal facilities with Brazil. A similar amendment was proposed to the Post-Office bill then, limiting it, however, to the South American ports, and we were asked to vote it then as granting additional postal facilities with the South American country. That bill, as we all know, failed between the two Houses; the Post-Office bill did not become a law at the close of the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress, and the result in part of that was an extra session of Congress for the purpose of providing the means of carrying on the mails. After that bill failed——

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from Maryland will allow me to suggest that the Post-Office bill passed at the regular session of the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. WHYTE. What became of the amendment put on the Post-Office bill, on which there was a committee of conference?

Mr. MAXEY. It failed between the two Houses, but the bill itself passed.

Mr. WHYTE. Was it withdrawn?

Mr. MAXEY. It failed in conference between the two Houses. It failed, but the bill passed.

Mr. WHYTE. That was not my recollection of it. We had a committee appointed in regard to the question of privilege between the two Houses, and my impression is that the bill failed. However, I stand corrected.

Mr. MAXEY. I was on the conference and recollect all about it.

Mr. WHYTE. I was on the committee to consider the differences between the two Houses on that Post-Office bill, and my recollection was that it failed. I stand corrected, though, if the Senator from Texas corrects me. I may be mistaken; I am speaking entirely from memory, and I do not stand upon it. The question was discussed over and over again, the conference failed to agree once or twice, and if at last they agreed, it escaped my recollection.

However, Mr. President, soon after that desire for postal facilities with Brazil, I remember to have seen a letter from the consul of the United States at Para, one of the principal towns, in honor of which Mr. Roach has called one of his steamships. I was struck with that, and I would like the Senate to see what the character of the facilities which American citizens have in these foreign countries for which we are to do so much by building up lines of steamships—what facilities our people have in their post-offices. I will read a letter from the consul of the United States at Para, Brazil, dated January 7, 1879:

> Your communication of date November 4 last was received some time since, but has remained unanswered for the reason that I have been exceedingly busy in the mean time. The Brazilian post-office system might possibly by some be considered a peculiar one. All mail matter for delivery is divided into two classes, one for Brazilians, the other for foreigners. The first is handed out as inquired for, and the latter is thrown into a heap—letters and papers, &c.—on a public table, where any and every person who chooses may at any time handle them over and appropriate whichever and whatever they like. Of course there is much complaint among Americans here of failure to receive their letters, but with such a system this is little surprising.

I think if the Post-Office Department were to direct its attention to the facilities on land in Brazil it would be of far more importance to American citizens than to devise means to carry their letters across the water, for after they have been carried to Para they run the risk of being picked up and taken off by somebody other than the gentleman to whom they are addressed. But, Mr. President, there is no difficulty about our mail system with Brazil, or with Europe, or with any foreign countries; there is no complaint of it; and this, I speak it respectfully, is a delusion, and if it were not sustained and commended by honorable Senators for whose character for integrity and high-mindedness I have the greatest respect, I would say it was a snare; but, respectfully and in parliamentary language, I have a right to say it is a delusion.

Mr. President, it is the sheerest folly for the Senate of the United States to-day to suppose that by any amendment of this character they are to restore our foreign commerce in the smallest degree. The Senator from Alabama who last addressed us [Mr. MORGAN] spoke of this as a new and untried scheme to build up the commerce of our country; he spoke of it as if we were not liberal-minded and free-minded enough to give this experiment a trial, when we know that the greatest element of statesmanship is to learn by experience, and not be guilty of the same folly which our country has been guilty of in the past to its great injury. These are no new measures. Forty years ago, during the extra session of the Twenty-seventh Congress, Butler King, of Georgia, conceiving this same idea, that this was a grand scheme to build up American commerce, to build up a great squadron of magnificent vessels which could be used in the carrying trade and in carrying the postal mails during peace and converted with guns upon their decks into frigates of war in time of difficulty with foreign nations, proposed then as the Post-Office Committee propose now to give a million dollars in aiding individuals to establish and maintain steamship lines. He brought in a famous recommendation in a report reciting that England had done, reviewing England's course with its various steamship companies, with its contracts, with its establishments of lines to various parts of the world where it had colonies, and asked us to imitate her example and try to emulate her in building up as she had done her foreign commerce in that way. That report carried with it a recommendation by way of resolution directing the Secretary of the Navy to investigate the subject and to report. What did that live man, Thomas H. Benton, ten years afterward, say about that report? I have that report here. I have renewed my recollection of it this morning. What did he say in regard to that proceeding? In the second volume of his Thirty Years, after describing the amount for the home squadron and citing the part of the report relating to the building up of foreign commerce by the subsidizing (he did not use the word then) of this line of steamers, Mr. Benton said:

> This resolution was adopted, and laid the foundation for those annual enormous appropriations for private lines of ocean steamers which have subjected many members of Congress to such odious imputations, and which has taken and is taking so many millions of the public money to enable individuals to break down competition and enrich themselves at the public expense. It was a measure worthy to go with the home squadron, and the worst of the two, each a useless waste of money, and each illustrating the difficulty and almost total impossibility of getting rid of bad measures when once passed, and an interest created for them.

Ah, Mr. President, in brief, what a commentary upon the folly of that day. When we began, as I presume the supporters of this amendment will now begin, if they succeed, a system which it will be hard for us to throw off, a system which will take out of the public Treasury many millions of dollars, and at a time, too, when the people are crying out for a reduction of the taxes upon their industries, and appealing to Congress to relieve them from their stamps on bank-checks, from taxes on bank deposits, and from taxes on various other articles which enter into the use of men day after day—at a time when we have not yet relieved the country of the war taxes, we are asked to open the Treasury door for this new expenditure of money, which will be as surely wasted in the future as public money in similar enterprises was wasted in the past. Let us see what was done. One of my honorable friends spoke about subsidies to the railroads, and told us the fact that in order to build the roads across the continent we had appropriated vast quantities of the public domain, in all as by calculation 200,000,000 acres, worth at least $50,000,000, and we had appropriated these lands for various enterprises of every sort and description.

If there was any case in which there was reason that there should be an exception to a general rule it was in regard to the great railroad to San Francisco, because the war showed that with no commerce our possessions upon the Pacific slope were valueless to us, and unapproachable, and it was all-important, with the decay of American commerce on the high seas, to open a way from our sea-ports on the Atlantic to those magnificent harbors on the Pacific coast. But what was the voice of the people in regard to those subsidies? In 1870 Mr. Holman, of Indiana, introduced in the House of Representatives a resolution declaring that those subsidies must stop; that it was squandering the public domain in the interests of corporations and depriving the people of the United States of much of that area of land upon which they were hereafter to settle, either they themselves or their children and their children's children. Mr. Holman offered that resolution in March, 1870, and there was not a single member of the House of Representatives, democrat or republican, who dared to raise his voice to say "nay." It passed unanimously. Then in the Forty-fourth Congress the same character of resolution was adopted and carried overwhelmingly by the democracy then assembled in the lower House of Congress.

Our honorable friends liken our country to England, and cite to us the course of England in regard to its foreign commerce and its postal facilities as an example for us to emulate and the road in which we should walk. How differently are the two nations situated. England had dependencies in almost every quarter of the globe. Her dependents amounted in all to more than two hundred million people and were scattered everywhere. Was she to leave them? Was she to turn her back upon them? Was she not in the march of political conquest anxious to enlarge rather than abridge her area of possession? Was she to deny communication to those sent abroad with her army, or to those who had been sent abroad to establish corresponding houses of merchandise, of commerce, of finance in her various dependencies? Was she to let them go? Was she to let father thus be separated from son, wife from husband, business man from business man, without any effort? No, Mr. President. On the contrary, it was her business not only to take care of them, but to build up every one of the ports whither her people had gone where her dependents lived, and it was her duty to provide as quick communication with them as possible; to establish them in their financial business and in their manufacturing business, so that not only were her vessels to carry the mails to them, but to carry the manufactures of her country to them, manufactured by their orders to suit the tastes of the various people among whom her agents lived, and thus to build up a specific trade in which England would be mistress and nobody could compete with her.

That was what England had in view, and thus it was that England determined to open up lines of communication between her people and herself. Away back, before our Declaration of Independence, such was her policy, and for thirty years after we separated ourselves from her she kept up by public competition among her citizens contracts as I say for carrying the mails and carrying merchandise to the various ports which she wished to reach. After a while that did not do, and then England, conscious of her duty to her people, desiring still to reach them, established her own packet system. She herself established packets belonging to the British Government. Shall we follow that example? Will Senators recommend us to adopt the example of establishing packet lines owned by the United States, manned by naval officers, managed by the United States, and paid for out of the funds of the United States? I apprehend not. Then she put them under the admiralty, and there the expense was lost sight of. Why? Because the expense of the transportation of the mails and the work done by these steamships was hidden in the budget under the naval estimates. It came in from the lords of the admiralty, covered up out of sight, and the English people for years never saw what was being spent upon these packet ships run under the admiralty until finally she again broke up that system and opened to public competition the carrying of the mails in steamship lines, and paid them what they demanded under public competition, changing the old rule that had prevailed in England, as it sometimes, though not often, prevails here, of the admiralty giving to their political favorites and partisans this public service to perform. The public got tired of that and demanded a change, and the demand, as almost always is the case in England, was answered by a surrender to the popular voice.

Our case was entirely different. There was no call for us to follow in England's course. It was no example. Her practices in our country are—

More honor'd in the breach than the observance.

But we started to subsidize lines in 1845, soon after the session of Congress. Let me show the Senate in brief what a hostile writer, a man who is opposed to the views which I am expressing upon this floor, says of this service. On page 55 of a little pamphlet that I hold in my hand, written by a Mr. Henry Hall, I find what I shall read, and I ask the attention of Senators to it. I doubt not that many of them are familiar with it, but it is one of those experiences which it does no harm to have held up before us, that we may not forget what the past has taught and may not repeat it in the future. At all events, if it is repeated, let Senators repeat it with their eyes open:

The plan proposed by Mr. King in 1841 was to appropriate $1,000,000 annually for the transportation of the foreign mails. For this sum of money it was believed that there could be secured a line of four steamers from Boston to Havre to accommodate the growing commerce and immigration over that route; a line of four steamers from New York to Liverpool to contest the ground with the Cunard steamers; a line of three vessels from Norfolk to the West Indies; and another of three from New Orleans to the same islands.

Here it is all over again, the same old story, "to be equitably distributed." That is the sugar-coated pill that we are all to swallow. It is not to be exclusive in its character, not from New York, nor Philadelphia, nor Baltimore, but to be divided equitably, so that all shall have a chance. So it was in 1841.

In 1845 the Postmaster-General was authorized to go ahead and contract for ocean service in steamers wherever public interests required it, leaving it to him to decide upon the routes and ports of the several lines.

Here it is again, identically the same proposition:

Under this law he contracted with Edward Mills for four ships and twenty trips a year from New York to Bremen and Havre, for $400,000; and with E. K. Collins & Co. for four ships and twenty trips from New York to Liverpool for $385,000. Contracts were also made for service from New York to New Orleans and the Isthmus of Panama, and from Panama to California and Oregon, for $489,600.

I ask the attention of the Senate to this. In all $1,274,600 was expended in the year 1845 for this identical purpose that it is now proposed we shall spend a million dollars for.

Congress approved these contracts, and advanced part of the money upon them to assist in building the ships.

This proposition does not advance to anybody; it inures to nobody's benefit but that invisible contractor who has got iron steamships of the class described in his possession to-day.

It was stipulated that their hulls should be strong enough for war purposes. Service began on the Bremen line with one ship in July, 1847; on the line to California in 1848; and on the line to Liverpool in 1850 with two ships, two more being added within a year. By 1851 we had three steamships trading to Bremen and Havre, and four to Liverpool, under the pay of the Government, and—

Says this writer, who is hostile to my view—

our reply to England had been made.

It was a reply, indeed. The Treasury books can tell how we suffered by that reply, and I should like to find some of the vessels that we put upon the ocean to do that work, which was to flaunt the American flag in the face of the British lion.

In 1850 lines from the western coast to China, and from the eastern to Africa, were proposed, and a line was started to run from Charleston to Havana, under a pay of $50,000 a year.

Let us see what became of our reply to England. The Collins line was first subsidized at an expense of $385,000 a year. It went on year by year. Like Oliver Twist, Collins and his people came to the doors of Congress asking for "more." The daughters of the horseleech never can be satisfied. At last in 1852 we had increased the subsidy to the Collins line, which began at $385,000, to $858,000. They came here year by year asking for help. Why did they not succeed? I tell you what the advocates of this measure say out of the Senate. It is a matter of public history. I tell you why they say they did not succeed. Their argument is not true, but here is what they say was the cause. It ran along, I think, until 1855. Then Congress, aroused to the folly of attempting to keep up American commerce by any such means, determined that the appropriations should cease. But just before that, according to my recollection, an appropriation only for $350,000 had passed Congress and was vetoed by Franklin Pierce on the ground that it was a waste of public money. Congress itself afterward set its face like flint against it until the war broke out. Says this writer:

The agricultural interests of the United States appeared in Congress in 1853 and demanded a cancellation of the contracts. Debate began in the session of 1853–'54, upon a proposition to reduce the compensation of Collins. It was continued through several succeeding years, the whole policy of protection—the whole policy of protection to steam navigation undergoing a thorough and protracted discussion, and being, at times, the leading topic before Congress. The opposition to the subsidy system came chiefly from the South. The politicians of that section had become predominant in politics, and the interest they represented was dictating the whole policy of the Government on economical questions. An abolition of the protective tariff had been conceded to it years before, among other things. Jefferson Davis and Judah P. Benjamin were active advocates of an abandonment of the carrying-trade of the Atlantic to British hands, and hardly a voice was lifted in opposition to them from the agricultural States. Mr. Clingman, of North Carolina, proposed that an attempt should be made to induce England to abandon the subsidy system—a suggestion at the same time hopeless and absurd. The arguments of the Congressmen from the agricultural States were supplemented in 1855 by offers from the North German Lloyd Company, which had begun to run steamers from Hamburg, and by Mr. Vanderbilt, who had two or three steamers for which he wished to find employment, to carry the mails at reduced rates.

They called it protection in those days—

Then this writer, anxious to fire the northern heart in favor of his scheme, puts it upon the southern people that they had defeated subsidies to steam mail ships through political designs and political artifice. In behalf of the South I deny it. It was opposed in my State, a commercial State, a State not agricultural in any great degree, a State whose chief city pays the greatest portion of the expenses of the whole State government in the taxes levied upon its commerce and its manufactures. Our people opposed it upon the ground that it was folly; that it was unwise in the people of this country to subsidize any steam lines, and to give them great largesses to grow up rich either as individuals or powerful as corporations at the expense of the many who were paying the taxes that went into the public Treasury.

But the experiment failed; it went by the board, and we heard no more of subsidies until the close of the war, when Cornelius Garrison came here with his line of steamers for Brazil and the southern ports, and said to the people of this country that if they would subsidize his vessels and give a good fat bonus he would contest upon the ocean with England and other nations the supremacy of the carrying trade. Congress did it for ten years. It began with an annual subsidy of $150,000 and it lasted until 1875, and now within five years of that disastrous failure we are asked to repeat the folly and begin again. What good did it do to American commerce? Look at the record. Facts speak like the spear of Ithuriel as it moves. You cannot get away; it is exact. So with the facts with regard to the commerce then. Let us see what Garrison did for us with Brazil:

Our imports from that country for the six years just preceding the establishment of the Garrison line averaged per annum $14,528,533; while our exports for the same time averaged per annum $5,713,511.

During all that period there was no subsidy; there was no five hundred thousand dollars for carrying the mails and thereby incidentally building up American commerce. During the ten years covered by the Garrison line—

The value of our average annual imports—

I ask the attention of honorable Senators to this; these are not arguments, they are facts; they cannot be disputed; they are facts taken from the public records—

The value of our average annual imports was $29,463,405; while the average annual value of our exports was but $6,364,600.

So that the Senate will see that we bought twice as much as when there was no subsidy and we increased our sales but one-eighth, although donating for the experiment $1,500,000. We bought twice as much from Brazil as we bought before we gave any subsidy at all; we doubled our imports and increased our exports one-eighth. No wonder when 1875 came Mr. Garrison was told, "We have no more money for you." No wonder he was turned away from the Halls of Congress.

Do not let us forget the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. Gentlemen will not forget how we subsidized that line. While we may not forget it, can we not draw a veil over the eyes of the American people and save them from the specter of that scandal which smirched Congress and excluded one of the members from the House of Representatives? It was before that, twenty-five years before that, when Benton spoke of the horrors of such a system being ingrafted upon legislation. It has gone.

Mr. President, I have not a word to say of denunciation for anybody. I speak of the system as foolish. I have a right as a member of the American Senate to speak of legislation as folly, in my judgment. Other Senators may speak of my inveighing against it as folly in their judgment; I accept their criticisms upon my conduct; but here we are with the lamp of experience shedding its light upon the pathway over which we have trodden; here we are with the history of our own commerce; and now, to-day, we are confronted with the same proposition by honroable Senators, who are sincere in their belief that it will do good for our country; but with this light before my eyes, with this glare upon the subject, to which I cannot close them, I for one will not only vote against the proposition, but in spite of the impatience of my colleagues on this floor, in spite of their desire to dispose of this bill as hurriedly as possible, I have felt it was a duty to the people I have represented for the last six years upon this floor, before I left the Senate, to shoot one Parthian arrow at the system of subsidies, and to warn my brethren against allowing it again to become a barnacle upon our great ship of state.

Mr. Roach comes to Congress as he has a right to come; as an American citizen he has a right to appeal to Congress to adopt his view.

He has a right to denounce in proper language, as he does, the Chamber of Commerce of Boston, the Chamber of Commerce of New York, the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia, I think, and also to denounce me if he thinks I am a chamber of commerce also. I am willing to take it. I have read his testimony. Why does he not show us how his steamships for the last thirty months have been working? Why does he not put in his testimony whether he can live without his subsidy? Why does he not tell us whether he is now making money in the carrying trade between New York and South American ports? He is on that subject as silent as the grave. He puts in a long list of articles that his vessels have carried in the last thirty months. What are they? What do they amount to in dollars and cents? That important question is left out. Knick-knacks and notions, little traps of American manufacturers he enumerates; but on his list of exports are the same articles of flour and petroleum and so on, which we have carried in our poor little thirty-odd sailing ships from the port of Baltimore. Why does not the trade come here and tell us that Mr. Roach's line in thirty months has opened up splendid opportunities for American manufactures and American commercial men? Why does he not point out what this grand scheme has proved by an experience of thirty months? Why does he not tell us how much it costs to run his vessels; how much freight he gets, and then tell the American Congress, "I am building up a trade for your people; I am opening to them objects which heretofore have been sealed books, and I am giving them outlets for their surplus agricultural products and for their manufactures; I am giving them a chance to become rich; all I ask is for Congress to make up the difference between what it costs me to run my ships in a year and what I am really entitled to as a fair compensation for the interest upon my $400,000 invested in each of the ships, and on the capital that I have investsd in this enterprise?" Give us something tangible; give us something specific to act upon if he is not making money; but in the absence of that, in the absence of a demand for mail facilities, in the absence of a refusal to carry the mails, in my opinion there is no justification for the passage of this amendment, and I enter my protest against it as but the repetition of a folly of which the American nation has been guilty before.

Mr. MAXEY. If no other Senator desires to discuss the amendment reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I will close the discussion. I had intended to discuss somewhat at length the proposed amendment, but I know that the Senate is worried out—I am myself—and what I shall say will be as brief as circumstances will admit. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads have offered an amendment to the pending Post-Office appropriation bill, the object of which amendment is to appropriate $1,000,000 for additional mail service between this and foreign countries in iron steamships. That amendment contains a proviso which reads as follows:

> That the vessels employed for such service shall be owned and manned by American citizens, and that said vessels thus employed shall be iron steamships, accepted by the Secretary of the Navy, after due inspection, as in all respects seaworthy and properly fitted to such service.

I desire to say right here that I shall not indulge in an oracular or ex cathedra style. If I had any disposition anywhere on earth to indulge in such a style, which I have not, it would not be in the Senate of the United States. It has been argued that the effect of the amendment is to aid some invisible owner of vessels who alone could comply with the terms of the amendment. The amendment was framed in accordance with the act of 1792, which required the right to registration to rest alone upon the ownership of the vessel and the fact that it was commanded by a citizen of the United States. The ownership must be American, the command must be American, and under the act of 1792 it made no difference where the ship was built. This amendment was framed according to the principle of that act. The object of the proviso to the amendment was to avoid, in so far as the mail service was concerned, that requirement of the existing navigation laws contained in section 4132 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows:

> Vessels built within the United States, and belonging wholly to citizens thereof, and vessels which may be captured in war by citizens of the United States, and lawfully condemned as prize, or which may be adjudged to be forfeited for a breach of the laws of the United States, being wholly owned by citizens, and no others, may be registered as directed in this title.

When the amendment proposed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was agreed to in committee the right of every member, as has been stated by members of that committee who have spoken, was reserved to vote as he saw proper upon such amendments as might be presented to the committee's amendment, the committee agreeing upon the proposition as reported in order that the subject might be brought to the attention of the Senate that something be done toward restoring American commerce in so far as this might be legitimately done in the carrying of the mails across the ocean. The views of members differed as to whether this could be done by encouraging the purchase of ships on the markets of the world, or by the employment of American-built ships in carrying the mails, all agreeing that whatever could be efficiently, economically, and constitutionally done toward restoring the carrying trade ought to be done.

I for one believe in the right of an American to go anywhere, into any country in the world, and buy a ship where he can get that ship the cheapest; and being owned by Americans and manned by Americans, I believe that he should have the right to register it as an American ship and sail it under the American flag. The Constitution having granted to Congress the power to establish post-offices and post-roads, Congress has the right in its discretion to select such instrumentalities as it believes to be necessary and proper to aid it in the execution of that trust. If Congress believe that it could better execute this trust by authorizing its citizens to go into the open markets of the world and buy ships where they may be bought cheapest, it has a right so to do, and it is not a violation of the navigation laws. I believe that if we adopt a system of going into the markets of the world and buying ships, and let those ships be manned by American citizens and have them to carry the mails throughout the various countries of the world, it would be the beginning of a system which would ultimate in the restoration of the American carrying trade, which has fallen so fearfully within the last twenty-five years. I believe that there would be not only a cessation of the decadence, but ultimately a restoration, of the American carrying trade. I believe it would be the beginning of what would terminate in the restoration of that grand trade, and so believing I favored bringing the subject to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator from Texas a question? It will not interfere with the Senator?

Mr. MAXEY. Not at all; but I do not intend to occupy much time.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely wish to ask the Senator whether, while proclaiming his willingness that ships entirely constructed abroad should be brought into this country free, he is willing at the same time that ship-builders in America should be allowed to have free the material wherewith to construct ships?

Mr. MAXEY. Unquestionably. I believe in free ships, and I would be perfectly willing to see everything that goes into a vessel, now made in an American ship-yard, come in free from duty—except its just revenue proportion—and thereby aid in the restoration of the carrying trade of our country. I am in the most unqualified way a free-trade man—that is to say, for a tariff for revenue only—believing that a man has the right to go anywhere in the wide world and buy a ship where he can get it cheapest; and in the encouragement of our ship-yards, I would be willing to see materials which go into those ships brought in and put into the ships as free as we could do it, paying only a fair and reasonable proportion toward the support of the Government, requiring, of course, the same of ships bought abroad. I believe in that.

Mr. BAYARD. Paying a reasonable proportion in what shape?

Mr. MAXEY. In the shape of a reasonable tariff. I am opposed to protective tariff of every kind. I am a revenue-tariff man, being a democrat.

Mr. President, that is the view I took of this matter. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] says that he believes the provision as drawn by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads would entitle these ships to registration. Had it not been for the discussion and the vote after that discussion I should have come to the same conclusion; but the Senator from Alabama saw proper to offer this as an amendment:

> When vessels built in other countries are so accepted and employed, the same shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges secured by law to vessels built in the United States of America, except the privilege of engaging in the coastwise trade.

I voted for this amendment because, if there were any doubt of the right of registration of ships "owned and manned by American citizens," although not built here, so long as employed in carrying the mail, it was but fair dealing to remove the doubt. It was right that the point should be made perfectly clear.

That amendment was deliberately voted down, showing that the sense of the Senate is that, although vessels built in foreign countries might be bought and owned by our citizens for the purpose of carrying the mails and be manned by American citizens, yet they should not be entitled to registration. To my mind this keeps the word of promise to our ear and breaks it to our hope. In other words, the effect of voting down the proposition of the Senator from Alabama is to limit a contract under the amendment proposed by the Post-Office Committee to American-built ships and no others. I do not believe in that principle. I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, because it removed any possible doubt as to the true construction of the committee's amendment, and beyond doubt or cavil entitled to registration ships owned and manned by American citizens wherever built, as they would have been under the act of 1792. When the Senate voted that down, it practically declared that no ships except American-built ships should be employed in carrying the mails or be entitled to registration.

The Senator from Alabama, [Mr. PUGH,] my colleague on the Post-Office Committee, gave so clearly and fully the reasons influencing him, which have induced me from the beginning to support some measure of this kind, that it is wholly unnecessary for me to repeat the argument. I find that in 1830 we had a population something over twelve millions. We have now 50,000,000. I find that we had only twenty-three miles of railroad in operation then. We have over eighty thousand miles in operation now. I find that fifty years ago we raised 976,000 bales of cotton. Last year, in 1880, we raised 5,500,000 bales. I find that in 1830 we had no telegraph. Now we have over one hundred thousand miles of telegraph. I find that fifty years ago we had in round numbers but 8,000 post-offices; we now have 40,000. I find that fifty years ago our imports were $70,000,000 and our exports $14,000,000. In 1879 our imports were $466,000,000 and our exports $715,000,000. I find that in 1840 we raised 84,000,000 bushels of wheat, and in 1880 we raised 460,000,000 bushels. I find that in 1840 we raised 35,000,000 pounds of wool, and last year we raised 225,000,000 pounds. We had spindles in cotton factories, forty years ago, 2,000,000; in 1880, 10,000,000; and so it goes all the way around. All the great industries of this country have increased amazingly, save and except the carrying trade, which has gone down and has almost entirely disappeared.

Many causes have been assigned for the decadence of our carrying trade. In 1868 gentlemen who spoke in the oracular style declared that it was due to the fluctuating currency of this country, but the record shows that the fall in our carrying trade was greater after the restoration of specie payments two years ago than it was in 1868. Others again say that it was due to the war, that great scape-goat which has to bear so many sins. Remove the cause and the effect would necessarily be removed. The cause has long since been removed and all other industries have revived, but the carrying trade has not revived. That reason will not do. I find other gentlemen say that there have been so many avenues leading to profitable investments that there has been no room for the investment of money in the carrying trade. I find that for years past money has been growing year by year cheaper and cheaper until it has got down to 4 per cent. and even as to United States bonds to 3½ per cent., so that that reason will not do. Money is cheap enough and yet the carrying trade does not revive. What then is the reason? My deliberate judgment is that it is owing to the navigation laws of this country. Every other cause which has been assigned can be explained away. That has not been explained away, and the man does not live on this earth who can explain it away, in my judgment.

I represent in part on this floor an agricultural State; a State which last year raised between a million and twelve hundred thousand bales of cotton; which stands third among the States in the amount of wool sent to the markets of the world; a State which is first in the great production of cattle; a State which is deeply interested in cheap freights; a State which wants to see the great carrying trade restored upon the high seas under our own flag, regardless of where the ships are built. I want the carrying trade restored, not that my State is interested in the ship-building business; not that I care anything for the quarrel which is going on between my honorable friend from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] and his pet familiar John Roach, one blazing at the other from the Senate Chamber, and the other returning the fire from somewhere else. I care nothing about that. The question is one of the utmost importance; one affecting the toilers of the country, the men who work the plow, the loom, and the anvil, who raise or manufacture products to be sent to the markets of the world to be exchanged for coin and such commodities as we need. Those producers and consumers of foreign commodities want competition in the carrying trade, and thus cheap freights; they want the $120,000,000 paid to foreign ship-owners annually, and which ultimately comes out of the pockets of the people, kept at home to do its good work in enriching our own and not the people of foreign countries.

What will restore this great carrying trade? Every one of us is in favor of doing that. We have from the Post-Office Committee presented a measure in which is contained, as I believe, properly construed, the right to go into the markets of the world and buy ships and have those ships registered; but when the direct question was brought up on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama and presented squarely to the Senate the Senate decided that that was not the case, because the amendment was ruled to be original legislation. If, then, it is original legislation it was because the amendment proposed by the committee does not contain the right to go into the markets of the world and buy these ships and have them registered. With that construction of the committee's amendment, upon which the Postmaster-General would doubtless act, the great purpose I had in view is gone. With that construction I cannot vote for the amendment of the committee, although had the Morgan amendment been adopted I would gladly have done so.

I have no doubt that my views will be criticised by the foreign ship-owners who get eight-tenths of the ocean mail carrying of the United States, who sail their ships under the British flag, the flag of France, and the flag of Germany, from the port of New York across the high seas, for whoever attempts to build up the American carrying trade necessarily brings down upon his head the anathemas of that class. I have no doubt my views will be criticised by the American ship-builders, because I want to bring competing ships in against their ships for the benefit of those who have the freight to pay, the producer and consumer. These are the men who have at last to pay for the carrying trade. The products of American industry are carried across the water in foreign vessels and exchanged for foreign commodities such as we need, and are brought back and consumed here, and the great bulk of freights are paid by our people to foreign ship-owners.

They are the men in whom I am interested. I am interested in the people who raise this vast surplus production which seeks a market across the water, although I would do all I could reasonably to aid the American ship-builder. With the producer and consumer cheap freights is the great point. I want also to save the $120,000,000 of gold which we pay to foreigners for bringing their vessels to our ports and carrying our products across the water and exchanging them for foreign commodities; to be brought back to our shores in foreign ships.

We have built 80,000 miles of railway in this country. We spend millions of dollars annually for the improvement of our rivers and harbors. What for? It is to land our products in the harbors of the United States. We get them there, and when they get there what is then done? The foreign bottom takes up the American products, carries them across the waters, and lands them in a foreign port, and exchanging them for foreign goods brings them back to our own ports. Those goods are brought back in foreign bottoms to an American custom-house, and thence distributed out among the American people, and we pay $120,000,000 annually for it. That may be wise, and those who want to bring that thing to an end may be called extravagant. I do not think so. I believe that the amendment should have been amended by the proposition of the Senator from Alabama, making plain what ought to be plain, that the Postmaster-General could employ vessels for carrying the mails wherever he could find them, and wherever they could be built, and at the cheapest rates; then have them registered so long as they remain in that service, so that they shall be entitled to all the benefits of American registered ships. I do believe that the outcome of that would have been a grand stride toward rebuilding our shipping trade.

Had the line been established from New York and New Orleans, the two lines touching at the ports of Norfolk and of Galveston, as named in the bill of two years ago, and thence down to South America, to St. Thomas, Para, and Pernambuco, it would have been the capturing of the grandest prize that this country could possibly hope to secure; a trade which amounts annually to over five hundred million dollars, because the trade of France, Germany, and England to Mexico, Central America, and South America amounts annually to over five hundred million dollars. These places are at our very doors; and yet the hue and cry of subsidy was raised by some who did not see proper to look through the great question. The result of it was the bill passed the Senate by a very decided majority, but by some means or other the bill was lost in the House; and the Southern States lost by that more than they have lost by the failure of any other commercial bill that has been before Congress for many years. I voted for that bill, and would cheerfully vote for it again. It would have shown to Americans exactly where they would start, where to land, what part of the people, what States, would have been benefited by it; and, although I would have preferred in that bill that the right to sail any ships whatever, wherever built, might be given to the Postmaster-General, yet, it being a mere question of policy, the great purpose we had in view—the securing the trade of the countries south of us—overrode what in that case was a minor point. The present amendment, however, was for broader ends; and the question of free ships is with many of us a vital point.

The construction which has been placed upon this amendment deprives it, in my judgment, of its greatest merit—the privilege of going into the markets of the world and securing and employing ships to carry the mail where they could be got cheapest. I hand in, as part of my remarks, a table, showing the amounts paid to American and foreign vessels for ocean mail transportation performed during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1880:

Thus it will be seen that we pay $158,000 to the owners of foreign vessels for carrying American mails while we pay the owners of American ships but $38,000 for their service. It is humiliating that this great country, now the head of all the nations of the earth, should have to employ the ships of any other nation on the earth to carry its mails anywhere for the still more humiliating reason that we have not enough ships suited to this work.

I also present a table showing the exact ships which are employed in the carrying of the mails, those registered as American vessels and foreign vessels, showing the ratio, and it will be most valuable, I think, to the American people to see such a table as that. It shows the humiliating attitude in which we are placed by not adopting some measure to rebuild the carrying trade of our country:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF FOREIGN MAILS,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1881.

JAS. N. TYNER, Acting Postmaster-General.

Whatever might have been my intention originally to have made a connected speech on this subject I am so anxious to get this matter brought to a close that I have spoken hurriedly and somewhat disconnectedly.

If the presentation of the amendment offered by the Post-Office Committee shall have the effect of directing the public mind to practical measures for the restoration of the carrying trade I will be more than gratified.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I appreciate the importance of time and therefore state to the Senate in advance that I shall not detain it longer than ten or fifteen minutes.

I am delighted at least to hear that the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] in a very able speech has announced his thorough belief in the importance of liberalizing the carrying trade of the United States in every possible way. The Senator from Alabama, [Mr. PUGH,] who presented a very forcible argument in the speech he made the other day, also declared that that was his purpose, and the senior Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] in the struggles he has made to have his free-ship amendment inserted, showed his desire to do the same thing. While I differ with them as to the effect of the pending amendment I believe that it is the purpose of each of them as earnestly as it is my purpose to endeavor to have the carrying trade of this country, in part at least, restored to American citizens under the American flag. The difficulty I have about this amendment is that I fail to appreciate how it is likely to accomplish the result. I have not yet heard how it is proposed or supposed that the Postmaster-General will expend this $1,000,000. Observe the amendment reads:

> For additional postal service to foreign countries, $1,000,000, to be expended, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, in the establishment of mail steamship lines, equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican-Gulf, and Pacific ports: Provided, That the vessels employed for such service shall be owned and manned by American citizens, and that said vessels thus employed shall be iron steamships, accepted by the Secretary of the Navy, after due inspection, as in all respects seaworthy, and properly fitted to such service.

In the first place, the Postmaster-General is made the exclusive judge as to how he is to expend this money. In the next place, he is to distribute it equitably among the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts on first-class iron vessels owned and manned by American citizens. We have now but few vessels of that sort. There is no complaint, as I understand it, that the mails which go from America are not now carried rapidly and efficiently to all parts of the world, or that the work is not done to-day at a reasonable cost to the people. I agree with the Senator from Alabama that if there was any portion of the people of the United States who do not receive sufficient mail facilities, I would pay whatever was necessary to furnish them those facilities. Men living in Arizona or Montana or anywhere else have a right to the mails as much as the men living in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Louisville and Lexington, Kentucky, and whatever expenditure is necessary to give them that facility they ought to have. So with our ocean mails. If they are not properly carried now, they ought to be carried promptly and efficiently; but they are so carried, as I am advised, and carried at a cost not much exceeding one-quarter of what it is now proposed to give to some additional lines.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me, will he name a port south of Boston, excluding New Orleans, that has a mail carried to a country abroad?

Mr. BECK. I am not familiar enough with the postal service on the ocean to name the ports and to state at how much the mail is carried from each; but I know this, that out of the great port of New York over three-fourths of the mails that go to Europe and to the other great civilized countries of the world are sent, and I know that foreign mails from Savannah, from New Orleans, and everywhere else, reach the port of New York by rail, if they do not by steamer, more promptly than they could reach their destination, than it is possible for them to do in any other way.

Mr. MORGAN. We, living in the South, feel that the Government has been extremely unjust to us in denying us mails to go abroad from our own ports, and we want more facilities for that purpose.

Mr. BECK. I assume that of this million dollars the equitable proportion that the city of Mobile would receive would not weigh a feather's weight in establishing a line of steamships to go to England, France, Germany, or any of the great ports of the Mediterranean or elsewhere.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me one second, I will say to him that the citizens of Mobile in concert with some persons in Liverpool have subscribed their money and have established a line of iron steamships between those two ports which is now carrying on a very valuable and important traffic, but we cannot carry a mail with them because we cannot get a mail to go from the port of Mobile. Our port is closed to the mails of the United States by the policy from which the Senator from Kentucky refuses to relieve us.

Mr. BECK. I said I would not take more than ten minutes but if I go into a wrangle over details it would take me a great deal longer, and I do not desire to occupy time. I have failed to understand if this amendment passes, giving $1,000,000 to the Postmaster-General to expend, who is to be the beneficiary, what lines will receive it, or how it will be equitably distributed. What lines of American ships, owned and manned by American citizens, will receive it?

I have applied to some of the officials of the United States, indeed with all well-informed gentlemen with whom I could communicate, to give me the information. I will state the substance of the information I have received. If I am wrong I shall be corrected. I believe it will be distributed about in the way I shall state. I assume that no ships can be built during this fiscal year to carry these mails, so that the $1,000,000 we are now asked to give could not be used for that puspose. Of that $1,000,000 the Brazilian line will receive about one hundred and eighty thousand dollars per annum. At $30 a mile, at the distance from New York to Rio, that would be the amount. The Pacific Mail will come in for $192,000 on their China line; $102,800 for the San Francisco and Panama line, via the Mexican ports; and $54,000 for the New York and Aspinwall line, the distances being, respectively, 6,400 miles from San Francisco to Hong-Kong, 3,427 miles from San Francisco to Panama, and 1,800 miles from New York to Aspinwall. This will therefore give the Pacific mail $348,800 per annum, and, if it runs for ten years, about $3,480,800. Of course they would have to convince the Postmaster-General that they are the line equitably entitled to this as the proper distribution from the Pacific and other ports before that can be done; but that will be a very simple matter. There are now three lines between New York and San Francisco, and if the Postmaster-General should observe, what they will doubtless impress upon him, these three lines will obtain $662,400 per annum. That, added to the $182,000 to be given to the Brazilian line, would only leave $155,000 per annum for all the outside American steamships. Observe that on these lines to Brazil and on the Pacific Mail steamship lines all the steamers that will be required to run are running now, and are carrying the mails at a reasonable rate, mostly for the ocean postage. Not a single steamer would be added to the American commercial marine by reason of this distribution, or, at most, only two or three.

Again, we are now having our foreign mail service for this country carried at a cost for the year ending June 30, 1880, of $196,684. This sum pays for five hundred and fifteen mails dispatched to Europe, $103,708 being paid for that service; and for mails to Japan, China, Australia, India, Central and South America, the Pacific and the West Indies, the cost of the mails outside the European mails, is $42,776. That is all we are paying now, and all that the Department requires is being done. It does not estimate for more, and it generally asks for all it needs.

Why should we give a million dollars without information of how it is to be distributed, when we know that all of it will go to the Pacific Mail line and the Brazilian Mail line, with the exception of only about 12 per cent., to be scrambled for by those who are left outside? Why should Congress authorize the Postmaster-General, without taking some control over it, thus to give it to whom he pleases and to determine what is equitable, and to limit it alone to American-built ships owned and manned by American citizens? as though that would in any form enable us to build up the commerce of this country. That is an enigma to me. As the Senator from Maryland very well said, giving a subsidy, (for that is what it is,) a bounty, will enable the people of those particular lines to drive off every other American citizen who is engaged in that business along with those lines.

There was great wisdom in the veto message of President Pierce when he vetoed a measure just like this, which veto message was referred to by the Senator from Maryland. So wise were these remarks that I cannot refrain from reading an extract or two; they are very short. Said President Pierce:

> It will be regarded as a less serious objection than that already stated, but one which should not be overlooked, that the privileges bestowed upon the contractors are without corresponding advantages to the Government, which receives no sufficient pecuniary or other return for the immense outlay involved, which could obtain the same service of other parties at less cost, and which, if the bill becomes a law, will pay them a large amount of public money without adequate consideration, that is, will in effect confer a gratuity, while nominally making provision for the transportation of the mails of the United States.
> To provide for making a donation of such magnitude and to give to the arrangement the character of permanence, which this bill proposes, would be to deprive commercial enterprise of the benefits of free competition, and to establish a monopoly in violation of the soundest principles of public policy, and of doubtful compatibility with the Constitution.

When the question came before the House of Representatives shall the bill pass, the veto of the President notwithstanding? I did not look over the entire list of names, but I see some who are authority with me as democrats, among them Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, John C. Breckenridge, of Kentucky, and Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana; and there are ninety-seven others, as against seventy-odd who favored the passage of the bill over the veto.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the honorable Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, for an explanation of a part of the bill which came from his committee which has not yet been explained?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill as reported from the Committee on Appropriations contains this provision:

> Provided, That the Postmaster-General is authorized to pay to the colonies of New Zealand and New South Wales so much of the cost of the overland transportation of the British closed mails to and from Australia as he may deem just, not to exceed one-half of said cost; and the sum of $40,000 is hereby appropriated for that purpose.

Is not that a subsidy?

Mr. BECK. We are having the mails carried over this continent by an arrangement with them, and handing the service over to our own ships. England is employing American ships to carry the mails to Australia, and in order to obtain rapid transit over the short route we are carrying them over the railroads and paying the postage from New York to San Francisco, and then carrying them on this American line to New Zealand and New South Wales. By an arrangement between our Postmaster-General and the people of New Zealand the mails are carried upon American ships and our American railroads, in order to get them there quickly, and we have made an equitable arrangement which is simply what the service is worth and no more, not $30 a mile for carrying a single letter under the pretense of carrying the mails, as the amendment proposes. I may not have stated the facts exactly, but that is the way I understand it.

Mr. MORGAN. Is not that a subsidy? I ask the Senator.

Mr. BECK. It is not a subsidy in the sense in which this amendment proposes a subsidy; it does not approach it. As a good deal has been said about the British mail service, I inquired of our Post-Office officials and other gentlemen what they were doing, and I hold in my hand the latest report of the British post-office that I am able to get hold of, showing the amount that the British Government pays in every way, and it is all absolutely legitimate mail service. Of course England has to use more steamships than we do in the mail service. Why? Her East India possessions are divided by great oceans from her; her Canadian dominions are separated by the Atlantic Ocean from her. She has to send her mail on the ocean to her people as we have to send the mail to our people by rail. The whole amount paid by England is not as great as we pay, and her post-office is a source of revenue to her instead of being a drain upon the Treasury. A portion of her mails, as I said, are carried in American ships. When Senators speak about England subsidizing vessels, as we have heard it from time to time here, it appears that they charge to England the packets from Holyhead to Dublin, bringing the Irish mail across the channel, when they fine these ships £1 14*s.* a minute it they are delayed, making them put on the fastest ships on the ocean. This is the statement:

> The most highly paid packet service is the carriage of the Irish mails from Holyhead to Kingston, (Dublin,) £85,000, carried by the fastest sea-going steamers afloat, with a penalty for over time of £1 14*s.* per minute.

"The gross earnings," &c., are submitted. That service is charged as a subsidy to a steamship line. It is part of a proper system to give her people the fastest mail facilities. But I will submit the statement in full, as it was handed to me:

BRITISH OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

[From latest report of the British post-office.]

Colonial mails.

London to East Indies, China, and Japan, contract with Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company for a weekly service, via Suez Canal, £417,325.

Of this sum India contributes £104,400.

The British share of the postages amounts to, £60,000.

Leaving a loss to British post-office of £253,000.

London to West Indies, by Royal Mail Company, and Liverpool and West India Company, weekly service, including extra service to Belize, Saint Kitts, Nevis, Monserrat, and Turk's Island, £89,200.

Leaving a loss to the British post-office over and above the postal receipts of £50,000.

Halifax to Bermuda and Jamaica, contract price, £17,500. Loss, £16,500.

West coast of Africa, contract £7,863. Loss, £1,800.

The Australian colonies, New Zealand, the Dominion of Canada, and the Cape of Good Hope colonies pay for their own mail-service, and invite tenders from steamship companies of any nationality. A part of the Canadian service, also part of the New South Wales and New Zealand service, is carried on by American steamers, paid by the colonial governments.

All of which is as much a home postal service as our mails from Washington to New York and Boston.

To attain this great speed between Holyhead and Kingstown the steamers burn ten tons of coal per hour.

The trouble is that when you subsidize these Pacific lines and this Brazilian line you take away all inducement for people either to work cheaper or to build ships cheaper. I have an article showing what a gentleman who built many of those ships for the Pacific Mail Steamship Company said they would cost. He declared (and he declares now in pamphlets laid before the Committee on Finance) that he can build them at 10 or not exceeding 15 per cent. more than the cost charged in England; that a ship can be built for $500,000 here which would cost $450,000 anywhere else in the world. Yet that same gentleman built the Pacific Mail steamships, and this is the amount given by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company as printed in their official report of April 30, 1876: that company paid to Mr. Roach for the City of Pekin $1,264,000; for the City of Tokio, $1,275,000; for the City of San Francisco, $744,000; for the City of New York, $757,000; for the City of Sidney, $744,000; making a total of $4,786,338; leaving a profit beyond what had been said by that builder he could build these ships for of about two million dollars as compared with what they would have cost in England or elsewhere.

There will be no effort to build ships cheaper if we give these subsidies. It is an admission that in all time to come we will have to pay whatever ship-builders see fit to ask for their ships out of the public Treasury, and let them charge what they please and they will never make any effort to do any better. There is where the great evil comes in. We had a discussion on this subject nearly three years ago, on the 4th of June, 1878, when the distinguished Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] in answer to an argument of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] used this language:

> And more than that, you can to-day, in the Senator's own town and on the river on which he lives, engage to have iron ships built just as good and just as cheap as you can have them built on the Clyde.

And yet to-day, over two years and eight months after that, the clamor comes that we cannot build them at all. They never will build them as long as they can come to Congress and get subsidies from us to pay them whatever they see fit to ask as the difference between the ships they build and those built abroad. It is only when you bring them into competition and refuse to give them anything outside the regular pay for the regular work done that you will ever have cheap ships in this country.

I agree with the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] and both the Senators from Alabama that everything that can be done to lighten the burdens on our carrying trade should be done. Every burden ought to be taken off. I have not been able to think out the matter fully yet; but I have an idea as to what ought to be done. I am not sure that I am right, we may not have the power to do it, but I would strain all the powers of the Constitution to do something like this: after allowing our people to buy ships wherever they like, after giving every ship-builder all the free material from a compound engine down to a rivet to build ships in this country, if I had the power—and I am not sure we do not have it—I would allow every ship engaged in the foreign trade to be registered at the port of Washington. Maine is charging 2½ per cent. taxation on her ships, New York 1.75 per cent., other States are charging from 1½ to 2 per cent. I would require them to carry apprentices for the American Navy, five, if you please, for every thousand tons; let every 3,000 ton ship carry fifteen and educate and train them for the American Navy. I would require them to enter into a contract that the ship should be taken whenever needed by the American people in the event of a foreign war to be used as part of the naval force of the United States. Whether we want them or not, we have a right to make that arrangement with them, and when we had thus far adopted them I would deny the right of any State or municipality to tax the foreign ocean-going ships of this country so registered, so employed, and with that covenant being a part of the Navy of the United States they should be as free from taxation as are the bonds of the United States, upon which no tax can be imposed either upon principal or interest, because they are part of the machinery of the United States to pay its debts. That sort of relief will help the foreign carrying trade of the country. I would also pay all the fees of consuls from the Treasury; I would furnish pilotage; I would, in other words, lighten every burden; but I would not give a monopoly in the way of a subsidy to any class of ships to exclude other American ships, or to try to build them up in ways that have proven over and over again to be failures.

There may be some constitutional objections—I have not yet been able to see them—to the suggestions I have just made. We have registered ships very often in New York and Philadelphia that for five years never entered those ports. You can register in Boston and trade from New York; you can register a ship anywhere. Why not make the registry at the capital of this country? Georgetown is a port of entry. Why not make the ships so registered train American sailors for us? It may be said that these vessels are not fit for the naval service. Cannot sailing-vessels haul coal for the Navy? Has not Congress the right to say we will adopt them? It is nobody's business whether they are the kind of ships we may need for war purposes; if they are adopted by Congress, that settles it. I would build up an American marine in that way without imposing taxes upon the people, simply by requiring the local authorities everywhere to regard that portion of the national machinery as being free from any local burdens they could put upon it. I repeat I would do so if there is no constitutional objection in the way, and I hope before we meet next December some committee, that presided over by the Senator from Delaware or some other, will look into that question and say how far it can be done. But in the mean time I would not burden the tax-payers of the country any more to furnish means to the few steamship lines we now have. I think that will do more harm than good.

I was about to read from a distinguished official of this Government a portion of a very able letter he wrote to me. I do not care to give his name, because his suggestions might bring displeasure upon his head, and he is too able a man, I think, to be subjected to displeasure. He says in that letter:

> Subsidies are uncertain and insidious; they may for a while sustain, and then, by withholding, destroy; they nourish continued dependence, and are certain to excite an appetite for more, more, and their beneficiaries would annually besiege Congress not only for continuance but also for larger allowances. Subsidies would inure more particularly to the benefit of regular lines, since incorporated interests would be more influential and payments could be more readily based upon a specified service. Individual vessels for general service would be placed at a disadvantage. There would also be constant appeals for differentiation of amounts on account of the varied nature and alleged cost of the services rendered, so that no regular system could be sustained.

He agrees with me that you have to lighten up the burdens now put upon shipping instead of giving subsidies to them.

But, Mr. President, I said I would not take time by arguing the question, and I leave it for the Senate to decide.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. WITHERS. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me while I present a report from the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator can do that afterward. We have had so much discussion that I think I shall not yield. Let us take the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The Senator from Colorado moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. TELLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) On this question and all other subjects connected with the amendment I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] If I could vote, I would vote "yea" on this motion.

Mr. CALL, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. BALDWIN.]

Mr. BUTLER, (when Mr. HAMPTON's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] requested me to announce that he had to withdraw from the Chamber on account of illness. He is paired, however, with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] on this question.

Mr. PLATT, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOG.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ANTHONY. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who was called home by illness. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL. I was paired on last Saturday with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] I saw him in his seat to-day, and I presume the pair does not extend to to-day.

Mr. HAMLIN. I arranged the pair with the Senator from Missouri. It is certainly ended. The Senator is entitled to vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was waiting to see if the Senator from Maine was here. I did not observe the Senator from Maine with whom I made the arrangement. I vote yea.

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 14; as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WITHERS, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOAR asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2179) for the relief of Lucy D. Hooper; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2180) refunding to Robert F. Williams & Co. duties illegally collected of them on a cargo of salt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BURNSIDE, it was Ordered, That William M. Beebe, jr., have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. BROWN and Mr. KELLOGG submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FUNDING BILL.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 2097) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and for the suppression and prevention of contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator from Virginia withdraw that motion? I wish to move to take up the funding bill. After the bill is before the Senate I then will give way that the Senator may have the pleuro-pneumonia bill discussed for a short time, as I understand that is all that is proposed. I feel it my duty to bring the funding bill before the Senate at once, and after it is before the Senate, then at this hour of the evening I shall be willing to allow the Senator from Virginia to explain his bill. I understand that bill will not lead to a very long discussion.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator having withdrawn his motion, I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Mr. THURMAN. The proper motion of my friend from Delaware to make is to postpone all previous orders. The special order having been disposed of, we fall back on the Calendar, and he must get the vote of the Senate to postpone all prior orders. That being done, then he can move to take up the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I supposed the Senate would consider the motion included. The object was to bring the funding bill before the Senate now; and to meet the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Ohio I move that the present and all prior orders be postponed in order to take up House bill No. 4592.

Mr. JOHNSTON. With the understanding stated before.

Mr. BAYARD. With the understanding that I shall give way to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I would like to know the extent of this understanding. What does it amount to? That we shall have this evening to talk upon the cattle-diseases bill, and to-morrow go on with the funding bill?

Mr. BAYARD. My intention was to make the funding bill the unfinished business for to-morrow, with the understanding that the pleuro-pneumonia bill is one that will not create a long discussion, and it can probably be finished to-night before we adjourn. I propose to take up the funding bill now, in order that it may be the unfinished business for to-morrow. It is, when taken up, to be laid aside informally for the purpose of allowing the bill suggested by the Senator from Virginia to come up.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senate thought the question suggested by the Senator from Virginia of sufficient importance to raise a special committee to which it was referred, and the Senator from Virginia, as the chairman of that committee, reported the bill several days ago, and I do hope the Senate will take it up and not any other bill this evening, and let it go over till to-morrow as the unfinished business. I know that if it be taken up according to the proposition of the Senator from Delaware, the bill will go by the board. I shall insist that the bill of the Senator from Virginia be taken up for the purpose of being proceeded with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Therefore I am against that motion.

Mr. BAYARD. Then, Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. May I ask a parliamentary question? Is it not true that the motion of the Senator from Delaware is the one which should be adopted by the Senate whichever bill is to be taken up? The Senator from Kentucky wants the bill named by him to be taken up. He has got to have the prior orders laid aside. We ought to be unanimous in supporting the Senator from Delaware in laying aside prior orders, and then if the Senator from Delaware moves to take up the funding bill the Senator from Kentucky can vote "no" and make his motion.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts is entirely correct. Whoever wishes to take up either one of these bills should vote for the motion of the Senator from Delaware to postpone prior orders. When that is carried then it will be a race between my agricultural friends, and I am with them, and my funding friends on the other side—and I do not say whether I am against them or not—which bill shall be taken up; but the first question is, shall the prior orders be postponed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware moves that the present and all prior orders be postponed, indicating his purpose——

Mr. THURMAN. One word. Is the cattle-disease bill a prior order to the funding bill?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That I do not know.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are both on the Calendar. The cattle bill is first in order.

Mr. THURMAN. Then the motion of my friend from Delaware had better be voted down if the friends of the cattle-disease bill know what they are about.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to postpone made by the Senator from Delaware.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 4592.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Before that motion is put I desire to say a word. The Senator from Delaware was very kind to say that after the bill was taken up he would consent that it might be laid aside temporarily in order that the cattle bill might be taken up. Now, if the cattle bill is taken up I desire to have final action upon it. If the Senate will consent to take that bill up and let us have final action, I shall be glad; and if not, I shall have to antagonize the motion to take up the funding bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I feel it highly important that this funding bill should come before the Senate and be disposed of at the earliest possible moment; but I think it is of more importance that anything like an honorable understanding should be preserved between Senators.

The honorable Senator from Virginia is correct in saying that it was my proposition that he should withdraw his motion to postpone the present order and prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill indicated by him, and he withdrew it at my request with the understanding that if I could get up the funding bill then it might be laid aside informally in order that his bill which it was supposed would take a short or no time for discussion should be passed upon by the Senate. I did not think nor did I say that if that bill led to a debate which would carry it over to to-morrow, the pleuro-pneumonia bill should be the regular order for to-morrow as unfinished business. I did not mean that. I supposed the measure had in view was one in regard to which there would be but little debate and very little discussion, and that it could be disposed of to-night. The funding bill cannot of course be considered in so short a time. I did not expect to give way indefinitely, but only with the idea that the bill the Senator from Virginia desired to take up could be disposed of without a great expenditure of time. With that understanding, I press the consideration of the measure I have moved to take up.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make a suggestion to the honorable Senator from Virginia. I am very desirous that his cattle bill should be taken up and passed at an early day. Now I suggest to him to accept the proposition of the honorable Senator from Delaware. Then he is sure of all the time to-night. If it turns out that his bill is finished to-night, he accomplishes his purpose. If it turns out that his bill is so near finished that a short time in the morning will finish it, he can then with great propriety appeal to the Senate to let him finish it to-morrow. If it turns out that he cannot finish it in a short time to-morrow, he has got the same right to test the sense of the Senate to-morrow between the two bills that he has now and see which they prefer to take up. He loses nothing by accepting the proposition now.

Mr. BAYARD. There can be no difficulty about it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Then I will accept the proposition of the Senator from Delaware to go on now and make as much progress as possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 4592.

Mr. THURMAN. I think there is a much shorter solution of it, although what is said by the Senator from Massachusetts is correct. Let the cattle-diseases bill be taken up now, and let there be unanimous consent that it shall be the unfinished business for to-morrow——

Mr. BAYARD. Oh, no; that is not the understanding.

Mr. THURMAN. If any Senator objects, of course it cannot be understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to take up the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF ANIMALS.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask that that bill be informally laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 2097.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia asks that this bill be laid aside temporarily by unanimous consent, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to which he has referred. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The funding bill is so laid aside, and the bill referred to by the Senator from Virginia will be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 2097) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and for the suppression and prevention of contagious diseases among domestic animals.

The bill was reported from the select committee appointed to consider the subject, with amendments, and the amendments were acted on as they were reached in the reading of the bill by sections.

The first amendment was, in line 7 of section 1, after the word "the," to insert "number;" in line 10, after the word "contagious," to insert "and communicable;" in the same line, after the word "and," to strike out the word "provide" and to insert "the means;" in line 15, after the word "investigating," to strike out the word "contagious" and to insert "said;" in line 16, after the word "cure," to strike out "of said diseases" and to insert "thereof;" in line 26, after the word "of," to strike out the word "contagious" and insert "said;" and in line 34, after the word "of," to insert "not more than ten;" so as to make the section read:

That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, approved by the National Board of Health, and whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious and communicable diseases among them, and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country. The Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to call to his aid in investigating said diseases in animals, and in providing means for the prevention and cure thereof, the National Board of Health, whose duty it shall be to render such aid and to employ such means as they deem necessary to obtain all information in regard to said diseases, their prevention and control; he is also authorized to employ two commissioners, one of whom shall be a practical stock-raiser, and one an experienced business man, familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live stock, whose duty it shall be to advise with regard to the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and of providing against the spread of said diseases; he is also authorized to employ an agent in each State and Territory, whose duty it shall be to collect all facts and statistics belonging to the animal industry and to the diseases of animals in such State or Territory, and report to the Commissioner of Agriculture. The compensation of said commissioners, agents, and of the members of the National Board of Health while employed in this service shall be at the rate of not more than $10 per diem, with all necessary traveling expenses while engaged in the performance of their duty under this act. The salary of the chief of bureau shall be $3,000 per annum; and the Commissioner of Agriculture shall appoint a clerk for said bureau, with a salary of $2,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 1, after the word "of," to strike out "cattle" and insert "live stock;" in line 5, after the word "contagious" to insert "or communicable;" in line 8, after the word "which," to strike out "cattle" and insert "live stock;" in line 11, after the word "of," to strike out the word "cattle" and insert "live stock;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That in order to promote the exportation of live stock from the United States the Commissioner of Agriculture, through said chief of bureau, shall make special investigation as to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia, or any contagious or communicable disease, along the dividing line between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, and along the lines of transportation from all parts of the United States to ports from which live stock are exported, and make report of the results of such investigation to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall establish such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live stock as the results of said investigation may require.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 2, after the word "bureau," to strike out the words "acting with the National Board of Health;" in line 6, after the word "of," to strike out the words "neat cattle" and insert "live stock;" in line 7, after the word "safe," to strike out the word "conveyance" and insert "transportation;" in line 8, after the word "such," to strike out the word "cattle" and to insert "stock;" in line 9, after the word "such," to strike out the word "cattle" and insert "stock;" in line 12, after the word "of," to strike out the words "the disease" and insert "said diseases;" in line 15, after the word "having," to strike out the words "the disease" and insert "said diseases;" in line 16, after the word "provide," to insert "by the appointment of inspectors, to be approved by the National Board of Health;" and at the end of the section to insert "but the provisions of this act shall not apply to cattle shipped from the Gulf States, or any of them, to the West India Islands," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the Commissioner of Agriculture, through said chief of bureau, and the commissioners provided for in section 1 of this act, when deemed necessary, shall co-operate with and aid State and municipal authorities, and corporations and persons engaged in the transportation of live stock, by land or water, in establishing regulations for the safe transportation of such stock from the interior to the seaboard, and the shipment thereof, so that such stock may not be exposed to said disease, and shall also co-operate with State and municipal authorities in the suppression of said diseases by aiding in carrying into effect their laws and regulations, by advising or assisting them in establishing regulations for the isolation of any cattle suspected of having said diseases and the slaughter of those ascertained to be so diseased, and shall provide, by the appointment of inspectors, to be approved by the National Board of Health, for the inspection of all cattle passing from the United States or shipped for exportation to a foreign country, and for giving proper certificates of health. But the provisions of this act shall not apply to cattle shipped from the Gulf States, or any of them, to the West India Islands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 4, lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, to strike out the words "whenever the Commissioner of Agriculture, acting in the manner prescribed in section 3 of this act, shall find that there is a necessity for quarantine stations, he shall report the facts to;" in line 4, after the word "Treasury," to strike out the words "whose duty it;" in line 5, after the word "shall," to strike out the words "be to;" in line 6, after the word "any," to strike out the word "cattle" and insert "live stock;" and in line 10, after the word "of," to strike out the words "the disease" and insert "said diseases;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall establish quarantine stations at such ports or other points as may be necessary for any live stock that may be imported from foreign countries, and may establish and carry into effect such regulations, consistent with State laws, as may be necessary to prevent the spread of said diseases by importations from abroad; and is authorized to employ officers of the customs and vessels of the revenue marine service in carrying out and enforcing such regulations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 5, after the word "with," to strike out the words "an infectious or contagious disease" and insert "such diseases, or has been exposed presumably thereto;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful to import or introduce into the United States from foreign countries, or into one State, Territory, or District from another State, Territory, or District, or to sell or offer for sale any domestic animal affected with such diseases, or has been exposed presumably thereto, except in accordance with the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations adopted in pursuance thereof.

Mr. COCKRELL. Before that amendment is adopted I wish to suggest a word. It now reads "or to sell or offer for sale any domestic animal affected with such diseases, or has been exposed presumably thereto." It ought to read "or which has been." After the word "or" I suggest the insertion of "which."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I would suggest to the Senator from Virginia in charge of the bill that in section 5, line 3, where the words "or District" occur, they should be stricken out. I doubt the power of Congress to interfere with the transportation of animals from one district in the same State to another.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That means the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS. Then put in "the District of Columbia" instead of "District," and that will obviate the objection.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Then I move to insert in lieu of "District" the words "District of Columbia."

Mr. HOAR. That does not mean judicial district.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read as amended.

The SECRETARY. After the word "or" in line 3, section 5, it is proposed to insert "the," and after "District" in the same line, to insert "of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The words "of Columbia" should be inserted in the subsequent line after "District."

Mr. HARRIS. "Or said District."

The SECRETARY. After the last word "or," in line 3, it is proposed to insert "said."

Mr. HARRIS. That will do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, no one can overrate the importance of this subject, and no one Senator is more disposed to give to it a careful consideration and to find out some mode by which the country can be protected from the calamity that has befallen other countries from contagious diseases in live stock than I am. I come from a State eminently agricultural, one that has in it as many fine cattle, perhaps, as any State in the Union, as many intelligent stock-raisers as any State in the Union; and they feel the keenest interest in this subject. But, with due respect to the committee that reported this bill which I have just read for the first time this afternoon—for it was reported not a great while ago—I regret that this bill does not seem to me, upon the first reading of it, to be what the occasion requires. There is an immense amount of machinery in this bill. We have this new institution of Government, the National Board of Health, brought in, that was established to protect human beings, and now its duties are to be extended to protect the brute creation as well as human beings; and we have a provision that I confess on the first reading of the bill I cannot understand at all, as to the officers created by this bill being aids assisting and encouraging the State authorities in their efforts to suppress contagious diseases. And we have some other provisions in the bill that strike me as a little curious and that might give rise to some little trouble.

The bill nowhere says that diseased cattle shall be slaughtered, and yet there seems to be an implication that they may be; but by whom does not very clearly appear; under what authority does not very clearly appear; but if I understand it aright they are to be slaughtered under State authority, and then, if slaughtered under State authority, they are to be paid for by the United States. What is this provision?

Provided, however, That a sum not exceeding two-thirds the market value of a healthy animal shall be allowed for an infected or diseased one, and a sum not exceeding $100 may be paid in special cases, but no animal shall be considered of special value unless he be purely bred, and the pedigree found duly recorded in a well-established herd-book.

Mr. President, I think that would trouble the farmers of Illinois, and the farmers of Indiana, and the farmers of Ohio. I think this pure-bred animal, with the pedigree in a well-established herd-book, will be a thing that the farmers will not very well understand out there, and they have to furnish that book before they can get $100 for an animal that, if healthy, they could sell to the next butcher for that sum.

Mr. President, I want most earnestly some action on this subject. I entertain the highest possible respect for the committee that reported this bill, and I know it was an extremely difficult subject that they had to deal with. It has been found extremely difficult in England, with an omnipotent Parliament and a comparatively small territory; and it must be much more difficult under our system of government, with our State authorities and the doubtful power of Congress over the subject.

Mr. President, this is not a bill to be passed without consideration; it is a bill that every Senator ought to read and carefully consider, and I really feel that I owe an apology for even the few remarks I have made that might seem not to be in favor of the bill, from the fact that I have just picked it up and read it. But it is a matter of such vital importance to the cattle-raising portions of this country, of such vital importance to my own State, that I cannot consent to allow a bill to pass which may prove an utter failure, when full consideration might make of it a wise and beneficent measure. In order to give Senators time to read and consider this bill, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I hope that motion will not be adopted. Let the bill be read through, and let us go as far as we can.

Mr. THURMAN. It has been read through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading has not been completed.

Mr. THURMAN. As there is a message from the House, I withdraw my motion.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE FERNANDO WOOD.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. THEODORE F. KING, one of its clerks, communicated to the Senate intelligence of the death of Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, late a Representative from the State of New York, and transmitted the action of the House thereon.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that the resolutions of the House be reported.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that the funding bill be laid before the Senate as the business under consideration when the resolutions are read.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator misunderstands me. I have asked that the message of the House be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 14, 1881.

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep regret of the death of Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That a committee of nine members be appointed by the Speaker to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. WOOD; and that, as a mark of the respect entertained by the House for his memory, his remains be removed from Hot Springs, Arkansas, to the city of New York in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and attended by said committee, who shall have full power to carry this resolution into effect.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate the foregoing resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions and ask for their present consideration:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with sensibility the message of the House of Representatives announcing the death of Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

The SPEAKER. There were four gentleman who during the call of States and Territories desired to ask unanimous consent to have certain papers printed in the RECORD. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOYD] to make that request.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. BOYD. I present for reference to the Committee on Commerce, and ask to have printed in the RECORD, a petition signed by Milton George and over 200,000 others, citizens of the State of Illinois and other States, asking for legislation on the subject of interstate commerce. I ask that the petition be printed without the names.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and was ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The undersigned, citizens of the State of Kansas, respectfully petition and represent that the railroad corporations of the country are charging rates of tariff for the transportation of farm and other produce which are largely in excess of what the capital represented by the roads is worth, or should reasonably expect to earn; that these corporations refuse during the times when business is depressed and values are shrunk to bear their proportion of the shrinkage, but compel other industries to contribute to keep up the value of their property; that while this is an injustice to and hardship upon every industry other than that in which railroad companies are engaged, it bears particularly hard upon agriculture, which yields, under the most favorable circumstances, a profit of but 3 to 4 per cent.; that in some neighborhoods farmers are practically shut out of the market by high freight rates, and that as the roads generally run through different States, it has been found impracticable to regulate them through local authority.

Therefore the undersigned pray that you will pass such laws as will provide for the appointment of a national railroad commission, which shall have the power to fix the rates of tariff to be charged by railroad companies for the transportation of freight, and providing also that the profits of a road, whether represented by dividends or in improvements or other investments, shall not be allowed to exceed a reasonable interest upon its valuation fairly estimated.

NAVAL TRAINING SCHOOL AT NEW LONDON.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT] made a similar request. The Chair does not see the gentleman in his seat.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I shall not object to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut, if I be allowed at the same time to have printed in the RECORD the report of a commission on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. On what subject?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. The subject of a naval training school.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot allow any conditional objection.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. WAIT said: I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut concerning a naval training school at New London navy-yard, presented by me this morning and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. And I ask unanimous consent to present and have printed in the RECORD certain communications relating to a naval training station at Coaster's Harbor Island.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can only entertain one request at a time. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. WAIT?]

There was no objection.

Mr. WAIT. I also ask that a letter from the Secretary of the Navy on the same subject be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The resolutions and letter of the Secretary of the Navy are as follows:

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
General Assembly, January session, A. D. 1881.

Senate joint resolution No. 58, concerning the New London navy-yard.

Whereas by invitation of Congress the State of Connecticut conveyed, A. D. 1868, by deed of gift to the United States, a tract of land on the river Thames for naval purposes; and

Whereas the Government has expended large sums of money on the same in grading the grounds, constructing a large wharf, erecting storehouses, &c.; and

Whereas Congress at its last session authorized the erection thereon of a building to be used as a drill-room for the apprentices of the naval training school, to be completed at an early day; and

Whereas the adoption of another site, which has been suggested, would involve large and unnecessary expense to the Government: Therefore,

Resolved by this Assembly, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to exert their most earnest and determined efforts to prevent the removal of said naval training school from its location on the Thames and from this State.

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolution be forwarded by the secretary of State to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Passed February 10, 1881.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, ss:

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said State at Hartford this 11th day of February, A. D. 1881.

[L. S.] CHARLES E. SEALEY,
Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON CITY, February 12, 1881.

MY DEAR SIR: The recommendation made by me, while Secretary of the Navy, for building a hospital at the New London navy-yard was made without special reference to the location of a station for training-vessels. I considered it necessary for several reasons. Ships will frequently visit there, both cruisers and those with apprentice boys, and its healthy location and facility of access will make a hospital, if one is built there, a most desirable place for such of them as may have sick on board. Crews whose health has been impaired by the epidemic diseases of the southern coast will find there such means of recovery as are not surpassed at any other point.

Very truly, &c.,

R. W. THOMPSON.

Hon. J. T. WAIT, House of Representatives.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD AND DRUGS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to present for reference to the Committee on Agriculture and to have printed in the RECORD a memorial from the Board of Trade of the City of Chicago, asking the passage of a bill to prevent adulteration of food and drugs.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, by order and on behalf of the Board of Trade of the City of Chicago, respectfully represents unto your honorable bodies that

Whereas this board is convinced that the adulteration of human food and drugs is a serious and growing evil, an outrage upon an otherwise sufficiently suffering humanity, greatly detrimental to the public health, tending to increase the death rate and to lower the standard of public and private morals, and that its eradication by well-considered legislation is both desirable and necessary; and

Whereas a bill entitled "A bill to prevent the adulteration of food and drugs," prepared after long and careful consideration by a committee of able experts on behalf of the National Board of Trade, has been presented to your honorable bodies by the representatives of that organization with the request that favorable action thereon may be had at an early day: Therefore,

Having carefully considered the provisions of said bill, your memorialists respectfully petition and urge your honorable bodies that said bill may receive from you that consideration which the great importance of the subject seems to demand; and that it may be enacted into law during the present session of Congress.

Respectfully submitted on behalf and by order of the Board of Trade, Chicago.

H. W. ROGERS, JR., President.
CHAS. RANDOLPH, Secretary.

CHICAGO, January, 1881.

HARBOR OF REFUGE AT MILWAUKEE, WISCONSIN.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I also ask unanimous consent to present for reference to the Committee on Commerce and have printed in the RECORD a resolution of the Board of Trade of the City of Chicago, urging the construction of a harbor of refuge at Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The resolution is as follows:

BOARD OF TRADE ROOMS,
Chicago, February, 1881.

SIR: The board of directors of this board having unanimously adopted the following preamble and resolutions, to wit:

"Whereas the west shore of Lake Michigan has long needed a harbor of refuge for the protection from easterly storms of the large and growing commerce of the lakes; and

"Whereas, by the aid of the natural protection now afforded by the shore line of Milwaukee Bay, a harbor of refuge suitable to the commerce of the lakes can, in our judgment, be built there at less expense to the Government than at any other point on the west shore of Lake Michigan: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That this board recommend that Congress, during the present session, make the necessary appropriation for a harbor of refuge in Milwaukee Bay, and that work on the same be commenced at the earliest practicable moment.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each of the Senators and Representatives from the State of Illinois, requesting their support of an appropriation for this purpose;"

I beg to respectfully request, on behalf of the board, your friendly co-operation in securing the necessary appropriation to begin and vigorously prosecute the work referred to, it being, in the judgment of practical men familiar with the necessities of our lake commerce, a work of great importance for the proper protection of the vast commerce of Lake Michigan.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

H. W. ROGERS, JR., President.

Hon. GEO. R. DAVIS,
House of Representatives, Washington.

J. F. M'CURTAIN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a memorial of J. F. McCurtain, principal chief of the Choctaw Nation, calling attention to the violation of treaties with that nation, and asking payment of an award made under the treaty of 1830.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The death of the Choctaw delegate, P. P. Pitchlynn, makes it my duty, as principal chief, to ask your honorable body not to let that event keep you from acting on the claim he was prosecuting. The surviving co-delegate, Peter Folsom, has been notified to proceed to Washington, and to pursue the course marked out by his lamented associate, who so long and so faithfully represented the views and wishes of his people.

It is no more than right, at the same time, to remind you of the repeated failures of the Government to comply with our treaties.

Just claims and unsettled demands having been often presented without effect by former delegates, the general council in 1853 passed resolutions expressing the deep sense felt by our people of the wrong done—first, by forcing upon them the treaty of 1830, in direct violation of former treaties, and afterward, in the numerous and flagrant violations of that treaty itself, causing heavy loss to large numbers of Choctaw citizens over and above the greater loss to the nation. Four delegates, Peter P. Pitchlynn, Israel Folsom, Dickson W. Lewis, and Samuel Garland, were instructed to lay the whole case before the Government, and authorized to effect a settlement by treaty or otherwise.

In October, 1855, they reported that the Government would not listen to them till they agreed to comply with a demand that separate jurisdiction should be given to the Chickasaws, and that a home should be provided for the prairie Indians in what is now called the "Leased District." They presented to the council a treaty on that basis, which was violently denounced on account of the large bodies of land it surrendered, and still more strenuously on account of its Chickasaw features. My father, who was a district chief under our old system, supported it because it promised a just, fair, and liberal consideration of our claims, both public and private. On that ground alone, it was ratified by a small majority of the council. That was in November, 1855. Twenty-five years have passed away. My father is dead. Most of the claimants for whom he spoke are dead. The members of the ratifying council are nearly all dead. The last of the four delegates who signed the treaty died last week. The Government has got the "Leased District." The Chickasaws have got their jurisdiction. The just and fair consideration, which was our part of the bargain, we have never seen. In 1859 the Senate made an award in our favor, which the treaty said should be final. That award the delegates who are now dead spent the last years of their lives in vain efforts to get paid.

Colonel Pitchlynn always said that sooner or later Congress would keep faith with us. In behalf of our people, I ask you to make good his words by complying with the treaty of 1855.

J. F. McCURTAIN,
Principal Chief.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I ask unanimous consent to present for reference to the Committee on Appropriations, and to have printed in the RECORD, an order by the Secretary of the Navy, and accompanying papers, relating to the establishment of a naval training station.

It has a frontage on the river of one mile and a breadth of 1,000 feet. The channel to the station has a minimum depth of twenty-six feet, with a breadth at the station, between the 24-foot curves, of four hundred and seventy-five feet; between the 20-foot curves, of seven hundred and twenty-five feet; between the 8-foot curves, of 1,000.

The advantages of this site are, that it affords a good frontage at which to lay up such vessels as may be used for permanent depot purposes, very good building sites ashore, with stone for building and a good supply of fresh water.

The disadvantages are:

First. Its distance from any large expanse of water in which to maneuver sailing vessels, it being necessary to go quite nine miles for such purposes, and even then it must be in the vicinity of very rapid tideway and dangerous shoals. This necessity would occasion the use of a number of tugs at a large expense, and the loss of valuable time in towing to and fro, a distance of eighteen miles.

Second. The want of a place for gunnery practice, no range being obtainable in the vicinity. This necessary part of a seaman's training would thus be lost.

Third. The liability of the river to be frozen over at this point, which, apart from hindering all operations on the water, would most seriously inconvenience the transportation of supplies from New London, the railway being on the west side of the river.

Fourth. The impossibility of properly training apprentices in boat service, either in pulling or sailing. Young sailors must be taught to handle boats in a rough as well as a smooth sea, and cannot be trained in the quiet waters of a narrow stream.

Finally. The isolation, which, upon inquiry, was found to be the chief cause of the many desertions that took place from the training ship Minnesota, which wintered here in the winter of 1879–'80. During little more than four months more than ninety boys deserted, and about thirty procured their discharge, the cause of the majority of cases, in both instances, being clearly traceable to despondency, occasioned by the cheerlessness of the situation and the monotony of the life due to the seclusion of the place and its gloomy aspect in winter.

Two points which are in favor of making this a naval arsenal militate against its use as a place for training purposes: these being the distance from the sea and the narrowness of the channel.

The State of Rhode Island having offered any land which the General Government might desire to select on Narragansett Bay, (as shown by a copy of the resolution hereunto appended, marked A,) we proceeded thither and invited the authorities to a consultation.

Several positions were pointed out, and after careful consideration it was determined that Coaster's Harbor Island appeared to offer the greatest advantages.

An inspection of the island disclosed its admirable adaptability for the purposes in view.

The island has a length of 3,300 feet, and a general breadth of 1,300, and contains ninety-two acres; its surface is moderately rolling, affording excellent facilities for drainage. There is one large building of very fine construction, containing heating and cooking apparatus and supplied with water from a source which is practically inexhaustible. This, together with several frame buildings on the island, may be utilized for various purposes. Good stone for building purposes and sand and gravel are found on the island in abundance.

The island is separated from the main land by a strip of shallow water with a general breadth of nine hundred feet, across which is thrown a causeway with a draw-bridge, affording immediate communication with, or isolation from, the main land at pleasure. It is situated upon what is undoubtedly in many respects, and especially for the purpose under consideration, the finest sheet of water on our coast, and is in close proximity to the sea—distant but three nautical miles.

The bay, which is remarkable as being the only harbor on our coast accessible in all winds, has a depth of thirty miles and an extreme breadth of twelve. It is interspersed with a number of larger islands which break the force of the wind and sea from whatever direction they may come. The water is deep and bold, and for the most part clear of obstructions, affording excellent facilities for the maneuvering of vessels. The holding ground is excellent.

The island is admirably located for the practice of gunnery; good ranges can be had from the island itself or from ships moored near by, or in case of target practice while underway. A sail of three miles will bring vessels to the open sea, affording opportunity for this very important training under the most favorable circumstances.

The near proximity of the torpedo station furnishes every facility for the instruction of apprentices in the practical use of torpedoes, an advantage not to be found at any other point.

An element of great consideration in the establishment of a training station is necessarily the climate. That of the southern portion of Rhode Island is remarkable for its equability and mildness, due to its seaward position and to the large bodies of water which wash the shores from every direction. These circumstances are the causes of a climate cool in summer and extremely mild in winter, enabling out-of-door exercises to be carried on with scarcely any interruption throughout the year.

The fact that the island is in the midst of a hardy, sea-faring race, from which the training system would draw many of its recruits, is also an element not to be slighted.

It is placed within easy access of New York and Boston, making the transfer of recruits from these great commercial centers easy and inexpensive.

In conclusion, we would state that Coaster's Harbor Island possesses every requisite as a site for a naval training station, and we therefore earnestly recommend its acceptance.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS AT WILMINGTON, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PACHECO. I ask unanimous consent to present for reference to the Committee on Commerce and to have printed in the RECORD a memorial of citizens of Los Angeles calling attention to the necessity for a rapid completion of the harbor improvement at Wilmington, Los Angeles County, California.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senators and the Representatives of the United States at Washington:

GENTLEMEN: In view of the urgent need of a rapid completion of the harbor improvements at Wilmington, Los Angeles County, California, and of the insufficiency of the appropriations now granted for that purpose, a mass-meeting of the citizens of Los Angeles was called Thursday evening, January 20, by order of the city council, to take the subject under consideration.

That meeting of the citizens appointed our committee to prepare and forward to you a memorial praying for a more earnest prosecution of the work by the Government. In accordance with their instructions, we have prepared the following statement and petition, and we beg leave earnestly to call your attention to it, and to ask your careful consideration of the facts as presented.

First. Until the completion of this work of harbor improvement at Wilmington, the California coast from San Diego to San Francisco remains without a single port of refuge for shipping in storms; nothing but open roadsteads for a distance of five hundred miles.

Second. The roadstead of San Pedro, lying without the bar of Wilmington Harbor, has been for a quarter of a century and is now the commercial outlet of a large portion of Southern California and Arizona. The freight received and shipped through it has steadily increased from an aggregate of 6,311 tons in the year 1855 to 110,000 tons for the year 1880, and is rapidly growing with each year. Grain vessels are loaded at this port directly for Europe. The passenger movements through the port for the year reach a total of 6,000. Arrivals of sea-going vessels: Steamers, 106; sailing vessels, 127—total for the year, 233. These vessels come from and depart for all parts of the world.

Third. To meet the two wants, namely, the creation of a harbor of refuge and the accommodation of the rapidly increasing commerce of the port, the United States Government, after three careful and exhaustive surveys, commenced the work of developing Wilmington Harbor. So far a total of $480,000 has been appropriated. With this money a breakwater 6,700 feet in length has been constructed—the outer 2,000 feet of it only, however, to the level of low tide. The plan of the Government engineers requires that this should be carried above the level of high tide. And a ship channel ten feet deep at low tide and two hundred and fifty feet wide has been dredged through the bar.

Fourth. The object of the works now in process of construction at Wilmington is not the making of an artificial harbor, but simply to clear a channel through the bor, and give entrance to a harbor already existing. This harbor, within the bar, is completely land-locked and sheltered from storms. It has a ship channel several miles in length, with a depth at low tide of twenty-six feet at its lower end, shoaling after some two miles to sixteen feet. It has ample space already for the accommodation of several hundred vessels at one time, and by the improvement of its side channel could accommodate twice the number. For an idea of its extent and capabilities we refer you to the accompanying map, but would state that the channel has been much improved and deepened since the map was made. We also refer you to the reports and surveys of the engineers now on file in the War Department.

Fifth. When the work was commenced the bar had upon it only eighteen inches of water at low tide. It is now deepened to ten feet by the work already done. The engineers in charge say that a depth of at least seventeen feet may be opened through the bar; and they further state that all work done is permanent, as the tide will keep open the channel when once cleared.

Sixth. The channel as now opened, although it is already of great use, is still too shallow and too narrow for the needs of the commerce of the port, all the heavier vessels having still to lie without the bar in the open roadstead, exposed to storms, and transhipping their freight by a tedious and expensive system of lighterage. At times communication is entirely cut off with the shore, and vessels are frequently forced to abandon the anchorage and run out to sea. In this lighterage work six men have been drowned within the past week in crossing the bar. The expense, the delay, and the dangers of this lighterage system have been, and are still, a heavy and grievous burden upon the commerce of the country.

Seventh. With the completion of the present work ships will be enabled to enter the harbor and lie alongside the wharves.

Eighth. The natural grades of the continent make Wilmington Harbor the practical Pacific Ocean terminus of the whole southern transcontinental system of railroads. Immediately back of it lies the San Gorgorio pass, crossing the Sierra at an elevation of only 2,700 feet, the only true pass in the whole line of that range. The routes of all these southern transcontinental roads lead below the snow line. Wilmington and New Orleans are the natural termini of the shortest southern transcontinental road. The connection from Wilmington Harbor through to the East by the Southern Pacific and the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé roads is now almost made.

Ninth. The engineers in charge say that the plan of development of Wilmington Harbor which they have been following is now tested until it is proven to be a success; and that with money more rapidly supplied the work might be pushed to completion within a comparatively short time, instead of being allowed to drag slowly along for years.

Tenth. Among the reasons which we urge for a more liberal policy upon the part of the Government, and for a rapid completion of the work, are these, namely: First, the pressing needs of commerce, the present system of lighterage involving an actual money tax upon the business of the country yearly of about one hundred and twenty thousand dollars; this in addition to the losses from delay. These delays and the expenses incident to shipping grain and produce through an open roadstead have for years retarded the development of this southern portion of California, which is by nature one of the most productive regions of the whole Pacific coast. Second, the dangers of damage to the present work while left exposed to storms in an unfinished condition. Third, the work can be more economically done with money supplied rapidly enough to push it at once to completion than if it is left to drag along year after year. Fourth, the intimate relationship which the port of Wilmington must bear to the whole southern transcontinental system of railroads, to which allusion has already been made, and the rapidly approaching completion of these roads render it highly important that the harbor should be put in the best possible shape without delay. Fifth, the more quickly the work can be completed the sooner will the capital now lying invested in it become productive.

In conclusion, we would say that we believe few Government works have ever been carried on more economically, more honestly, or with greater results to show for the outlay of money than this. This, too, is the only work for which we have ever received a dollar from the Government.

We would therefore, because of the vital importance of this undertaking to us, earnestly pray you to grant at least the sum of $200,000, which amount the Government engineers in charge of the work say can be advantageously used during the ensuing year.

Very respectfully,

YORKTOWN CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. GOODE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House joint resolution No. 337, returned from the Senate with amendments, for the purpose of concurring in the amendments of the Senate. It is a House joint resolution authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government and people of France an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the centennial anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis, at Yorktown, Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The amendments of the Senate will be read.

The first amendment of the Senate was, in line 2, after the word "France," to insert the words "and the family of General La Fayette."

The second amendment was to add to the joint resolution the following:

And for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this resolution the sum of $20,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same or so much thereof as may be necessary to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Amend the title so as to read as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government and people of France and the family of General La Fayette an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the centennial anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown, Virginia.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules this amendment of the Senate making an appropriation must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CALKINS. I would inquire if there was an appropriation in the original resolution as passed by the House?

Mr. GOODE. There was not; but it was suggested by the Secretary of State that it would be indispensable to make an appropriation in order to enable him to properly carry out the resolution.

Mr. CALKINS. Is this appropriation to be expended by the people of Yorktown?

Mr. GOODE. No, sir; by the State Department in receiving the delegation from France whom it is expected may respond to the invitation of the Government.

Mr. BURROWS. I make the point of order that the amendment of the Senate making an appropriation must be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GOODE. Then I will withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. The request being withdrawn, the joint resolution will remain upon the Speaker's table.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. GOODE said: I desire to request my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to withdraw the point of order he made a while ago, and I believe he is not now disposed to insist upon it, against considering at this time the Senate amendments to the House joint resolution relative to the Yorktown centennial celebration.

Mr. BURROWS. I interposed an objection because I noticed that an appropriation was made by the Senate amendment. I will not insist upon the objection.

There being no further objection, the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table with the Senate amendments thereto.

The amendments were read as above.

Mr. GOODE. I now move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. GOODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

No. 7033) making the city of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee, a port of delivery. This bill was prepared by the officers of the Treasury Department and meets their approval. It is also unanimously reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The bill was read, as follows:

That the city of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee, is hereby made a port of delivery, with a surveyor at a salary of $350 per annum and the customary fees. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to carry this act into effect.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBRELL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Business is now being transacted by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARNER. Then I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to dispense with the morning hour for reports from committees.

The motion of Mr. ATKINS was not agreed to, there being, upon a division—ayes 86, noes 58; not two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour for reports from committees will begin at nine minutes past twelve o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has never permitted this hour to be interfered with by legislation.

Mr. GIBSON. Then I ask that the bill be placed upon the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Does it relate to the revenue laws?

Mr. GIBSON. It does not.

The SPEAKER. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. GIBSON. There is not.

The SPEAKER. The rule requires absolutely that bills reported from committees shall be accompanied by reports.

Mr. GIBSON. I will hand one in hereafter.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be received and placed on the House Calendar, and authority given for the report required by the rule to be hereafter submitted.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. Then I ask that the accompanying report be read to the House.

The SPEAKER. That will not necessarily carry it into the RECORD.

Mr. BRAGG. And I make the point of order that this hour is set apart under the rules for the reception of reports and not for action upon them. Therefore, it is not in order to ask for the reading of the report at this time when no action can be had upon the bill itself.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. Very well. Let the bill and report be printed.

The SPEAKER. The bill and report will be printed, of course.

The bill was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. ATHERTON. We have taken a copy of the printed Senate bill No. 1935 and agreed to it, and have only used it in moving our substitute for House bill No. 6749.

The SPEAKER. It is not a Senate bill which is reported back?

Mr. ATHERTON. It is not. We reported back House bill No. 6749 with a substitute.

Mr. FORT. I want the matter to appear right upon the record.

Mr. ATHERTON. We reported back for House bill No. 6749 a bill (H. R. No. 7193) to confirm to the city of Chicago the title to certain public grounds.

The SPEAKER. The bill and substitute have been referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and will be printed with the accompanying report.

Mr. BENNETT. I desire that the bill shall go to the House Calendar. It simply provides for the sale of this land.

The SPEAKER. That is parting with the property of the United States, is it not?

Mr. BENNETT. But it does not dispose of the land except for the original purpose.

The SPEAKER. It goes to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE CLERKS, ETC.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 400) in relation to committee clerks, pages, and other employés of the Senate and House of Representatives; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. HAYES. I rise to make some privileged reports from the Committee on Printing. I am instructed to report back with amendments the joint resolution (H. R. No. 378) providing for the printing and distribution of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1880.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line 5, after "8,000," insert "181;" in line 6 strike out "13,000" and insert in lieu thereof "12,819;" so that the joint resolution as thus amended will read:

"Resolved, &c., That of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1880 there be printed 4,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 8,181 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 12,819 copies for distribution by the Commissioner."

Mr. HAYES. This is a resolution for the printing of the regular annual report of the Commissioner of Education.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF BUREAU OF ETHNOLOGY.

Mr. HAYES. I am also directed by the Committee on Printing to report back the concurrent resolution for printing the reports of the Director of the Bureau of Ethnology with amendments.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line 6 strike out "7,000" and in lieu thereof insert "7,272;" in line 8 strike out "5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "4,728;" so that the resolution as amended will read:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 15,000 copies each of the second and third annual reports of the Director of the Bureau of Ethnology of the Smithsonian Institution, with the necessary illustrations; 7,272 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 4,728 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology."

The amendments were agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

REPORT OF LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. HAYES. I am also directed by the Committee on Printing to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 386) for printing the report of the Life-Saving Service.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed 6,000 copies of the report of the operations of the United States Life-Saving Service for the year ending June 30, 1880, without the accompanying tables, (except the one showing the location of stations,) and without the accompanying reports on wreck ordnance, for distribution among the officers of our merchant marine, through the collectors of customs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COX. I should like, if in order, to offer an amendment to provide also for the printing of a map of all the wrecks and disasters on our coast. This has been done by the English Government with very successful results, and I think it would be a very advisable thing for us to do.

Mr. HUNTON. I was under the impression that I was entitled to the floor for business of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is entitled to the floor. But this is a privileged report coming from the Committee on Printing.

The Chair will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] the law requires that the question of the printing of any papers or reports to cost in excess of $500 should go to the Committee on Printing. The Chair thinks an amendment would not be in order which would involve an expenditure exceeding $500.

Mr. COX. Then I will introduce a separate resolution to accomplish the purpose I have indicated.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTON. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read the order of the House in relation to the business of this day's session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the expiration of the morning hour on Monday, the 14th of February, the Committee for the District of Columbia shall be entitled to the floor for the consideration during the remainder of that day of business for the District as may be called up by said committee.

Mr. HUNTON. I now yield to my colleague on the committee from New York, [Mr. MILLER.]

UNION RAILROAD DEPOT IN WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MILLER. I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 3047) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to designate a proper site for a union railroad depot in the city of Washington, and for other purposes, returned from the Senate with amendments. The amendments of the Senate were made at the last session, and in order to make the necessary correction of dates I desire to move that the amendments of the Senate be not concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The amendments of the Senate will be read.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out the following:

At some central point, having just reference to the convenience of access by said companies, and the people, sojourners, and visitors of said city, and to all the public interests involved, and report their doings in the premises to Congress within thirty days after the passage of this act with a bill containing such further provisions as they may deem best calculated to give effect to the purpose of requiring all said railroads to use said depot in common, and vacate all other depots, and remove all tracks not necessary for such use: Provided, That such union depot shall be provided by said railroads free from expense to the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Having due regard, as well to the interests of the residents and property-owners of the District of Columbia as to the chartered rights and pecuniary investments of the railroad companies to be affected by the action of Congress in the premises; but if, in the judgment of said commissioners, it is better, for the interest of all parties concerned, that two depots should be established, the one on the northern and the other on the southern side of the city of Washington, then to make selection of the two sites for the respective depots, and to report their action in the premises, with proper plats, to Congress during the present session; but if that is not practicable, then to report on the first Monday of December, 1880, with a bill containing such further provisions as they may deem best calculated to secure the use by said railroad companies of said union depot if so selected; or in case of the selection of the two depots aforesaid, to secure the use of the northern depot by the company or companies whose road or roads enter the city of Washington nearest to said northern depot, and the use of the southern depot by the company or companies whose road or roads enter the said city nearest to said southern depot, and to compel the vacation of all other depots and the removal of all tracks not necessary for use in reaching the depot or depots intended to be established under the provisions of this act: Provided, That such union depot or the two depots herein referred to, whichever may be selected, shall be provided by said railroad companies free from expense to the United States or the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONGER. How does that bill come before the House?

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House setting apart the session of to-day after the morning hour for the consideration of business relating to the District of Columbia. Under that order the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MILLER,] in behalf of the Committee on the District of Columbia, calls up from the Speaker's table the bill of the House with the Senate amendment thereto.

Mr. CONGER. Then, if I may, I object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman raises the question of consideration.

Mr. CONGER. No; not that.

The SPEAKER. The bill of course is open to the operation of all the rules of the House applicable to it.

Mr. CONGER. This is a bill which is intended to provide that all persons coming to the city of Washington shall walk into town or employ a hackman. I propose that it shall have some consideration in this House before it becomes law, compelling every person coming to Washington to land away off in some remote part of the District.

Mr. MILLER. I do not care to discuss the merits of the bill at this time. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that he is entirely wrong. This bill does not locate any depot at all; it simply authorizes the commissioners of the District to report to Congress a suitable location for a union depot, if one can be found by them.

Mr. CONGER. As I said, when the bill was up before, it is the commencement of a plan to remove from convenient places within the city the railroad depots which enable citizens, Government officials, and members of Congress to come by rail somewhere within the city without being compelled to leave the cars at Benning's Bridge or Point Lookout or somewhere else.

Mr. NEAL. Why not say over in Baltimore at once?

Mr. CONGER. Or "over in Baltimore." We had a hard struggle to have a depot located in the heart of the city of Washington, where the traveling public could be properly accommodated.

Mr. NEAL. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NEAL. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] have the floor?

Mr. CONGER. I know the gentleman from Ohio is very anxious to get the floor, but he can speak after I get through.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLER] has been recognized by the Chair as having this bill in charge. But that gentleman has not indicated any purpose of interfering with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] or claiming the floor himself as against him. On the contrary, he has answered some of the objections of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the question of consideration against this bill.

Mr. MILLER. Allow me to say that under the order of the committee I do not propose to ask for the consideration of this bill, but to move, as I have the right to do, having the floor, that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate and ask for a conference. That is all we propose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] raises the question of consideration, as the Chair understands, on that motion, as he has the right to do within the scope of the rule. The motion of the gentleman from New York is in the direction of legislation, which the gentleman from Michigan desires to prevent.

Mr. HUNTON. I rise to a question of order. I submit whether the question of consideration can properly be raised upon District business coming up under the order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The House this morning, notwithstanding the order fixing to-day for District business, might have refused by a majority vote to consider any business from the District Committee. The case is analogous to that of private business assigned under the rule to Friday.

Mr. HUNTON. But does it not require a two-thirds vote?

The SPEAKER. I does not.

Mr. HUNTON. To set aside a rule requires a two-thirds vote.

The SPEAKER. Friday is assigned by the rules for the consideration of private business, which can only be set aside by a two-thirds vote. Yet the House, when private business comes up under the rule, may refuse to go on with it; and the rule provides that thereafter public business shall be considered. The assignment of this day for the consideration of District business was, as the Chair understands, a concession to the District Committee; but the majority of the House might now say as to such business in gross that it would not consider it; and certainly if that power would apply to this class of business in gross it would apply to any particular bill. If the House should refuse to consider the bill, it would remain in the same position exactly in which it was.

Mr. HUNTON. Is it in order to say one word on the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill passed the House by a large majority, and, having been considered by the Senate, has come back with amendments. We propose to non-concur in the amendments, and have a conference between the two Houses. Surely it would be very proper to consider the matter now. As to the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] it seems to me a matter of great importance that there should be a union depot in the city of Washington, if one can be provided. The Senate amendment provides that if the limitation of the companies to a single depot is impracticable, there may be two depots, but that railroads shall not come into every part of the city.

Mr. CONGER. There are two depots now.

Mr. HUNTON. There are other railroads coming into the city. We want them all to come to one depot, if that be practicable, or to not more than two depots, if it be impracticable for all to come to one. This bill settles nothing. It only requires the District commissioners to report their views upon the question. Without a law on the subject of a union depot, none can be established.

The SPEAKER. The question is whether the House will consider this bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 73, noes 24.

Mr. CONGER. It is quite evident that a large majority of members are not acquainted with this subject, and I think a quorum had better vote.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONGER and Mr. HUNTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 120, noes 27.

So the House decided to consider the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLER] now moves that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. HENKLE. Is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HENKLE. Before this matter is voted on I desire to present the real question at issue, so that members may understand it fully. This proposition stripped of all its disguises means the removal of the Sixth street depot from its present site to some remote and more inconvenient location, in order that the wishes, perhaps the interests, of certain individuals in the city of Washington may be gratified, as I believe, at the expense of public convenience. For a few years past certain individuals here have raised an unceasing clamor against the location of this depot. They have persisted until we now have the question before this House in the shape of a resolution calling upon the commissioners of the District to designate a site for a union depot. The ultimate object and the main purpose, however, is the removal of the Sixth street depot from its present site to one much more inconvenient for the traveling public.

Now, my experience in the District of Columbia is that there is here a very considerable class of people—I do not mean all, I do not mean half, but I do mean a considerable part—who seem to think that the whole United States and the Treasury of the United States were created specially for their interest and benefit.

The proper location of railroad depots has become in this country a matter of most vital importance to the traveling public. It has become a question of convenience which interests the people of the whole country as to what shall be the site of railroad depots in this city of Washington. In other cities throughout the country you will see millions of dollars are being expended by railroad companies in order to procure sites and convenient locations for depots in central positions in those cities. In Philadelphia $1,000,000 has been recently spent for that purpose alone. In the city of Baltimore the railroad depots are in the most central and densely populated sections of the city. If you go throughout the country and visit the large cities you will find the depots for passenger travel are in convenient and central localities for the accommodation of the people.

Now, if it is a necessity in other cities, if it is proper that the traveling public should be accommodated, it is pre-eminently proper they should be accommodated in the capital of the nation. Washington City derives all of its importance from the importance the people of the country give it. Millions of people resort to the national capital year after year for the transaction of public or private business or upon pleasure.

This property in the District of Columbia, this particular locality, belongs to the people of the whole United States. They have a right to have their interests and convenience considered. Years ago the representatives of the people in Congress assembled granted this as a proper site to accommodate the traveling public, the millions of people resorting to the national capital year after year for business or other purposes. They reserved it for the purpose of this depot for eminently wise and sufficient reasons. There are more forcible reasons to-day why it should be suffered to remain where it is than existed that it should be located upon this site in the beginning.

This property, sir, is in a convenient locality. It is accessible readily to all the Departments of the Government. It is equally accessible to the Capitol, to the Treasury, to the Interior, to the Post-Office, to the Pension Office, to the Smithsonian Institution, to the Agricultural Department, and, indeed, to all of the various Departments and offices of the Government in this city. Passengers are landed near Pennsylvania avenue and Sixth street, and are at once within easy reach of all the great hotels of the city.

Is this House now willing to consent by the passage of this resolution to inaugurate steps which will lead to the removal of this great convenience from its present site back to a locality where every individual who visits the city, no matter how humble his station or how limited his means, shall be compelled to hire a carriage to get to his destination? Just think of it, Mr. Speaker; you are legislating for all time to come. You are legislating in reference to the location of a depot which will affect the convenience of the traveling public for centuries to come. I therefore ask, are you willing to subject the traveling public of the whole country to this inconvenience in order to pander to and gratify the caprice of a few property holders in the southern section of Washington, whose property has no value except such as the location of this depot where it is happens to give it? In time that place will be valuable for warehouses; but it will be valuable only from the fact that the depot is located there. The property will never be valuable as residences. The other day this reservation was all under water—a sort of lake or goose pond. Who considers it valuable for any other purpose except that for which it is now used.

These railroads, Mr. Speaker, have become such a public convenience they can no longer be ignored. The convenience of a site from which people can be landed within easy reach of hotels and places of business is a great desideratum and cannot be ignored properly in the consideration of this important question by the House. Hundreds and thousands of employés in the various Departments of the Government pass to and from the city every night and morning. Poor men and poor women who are employed in the various Departments of the Government and who find it economical to live beyond the limits of the city, in the outskirts of the District, or beyond the District in the States of Virginia and Maryland, go back and forth night and morning. They are landed here at a place convenient to these several Departments. In five minutes' walk they are at the places where they have to discharge their public duties. Remove this depot back into some remote situation or locality, and you subject every one of these poor people for all time to come to the additional expense of paying car-fare or carriage-hire and of losing twenty or thirty minutes in going to or coming from their destination. I think the time has come when in Washington we should legislate as they are legislating everywhere else—to locate these railroad depots where they will best and most conveniently accommodate the public. I regard, Mr. Speaker, this Sixth street depot as the greatest convenience in the District of Columbia to the traveling public. There is no good and sufficient reason for its removal, except, as I said before, it may be to gratify the caprice of a few interested parties. The people of the United States own this property. They own this Capitol and three-fourths of the valuable property within the District, and they are, of course, deeply interested in the question of the location of this depot; for certainly they have a right to have their convenience and wishes consulted as well as a few property-holders in the District.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain this House long in discussing this bill, because it fixes nothing. The gentleman from Maryland thinks it is the intention of the parties urging this proposition to remove the depots of this city to some inconvenient place. Sir, I take it there is nothing in this bill that leads to any such conclusion, and nothing has been done either by the Committee on the District of Columbia or by the advocates of the proposition to lead the gentleman from Maryland or any one else to infer there is any such desire to remove the depots of this city to an inconvenient place. But we realize, Mr. Speaker, the fact that this city is rapidly growing, and we have reasonable grounds to believe that in a few years it will number from two hundred and fifty to three hundred thousand people. That being the case, is it not wise for us at this time to take some proper action to regulate the railroads centering here? Now, while the city is growing and before its growth is attained, this work should be done. It is a fact that all of the great cities of the Union, all the great cities throughout this country everywhere, are now doing this. New York within the past two years has, together with the Hudson River Railroad Company, expended nearly four million dollars in the establishment of a grand union depot, with the object of bringing all of the railways centering in that city into one depot and in such manner as not to depreciate the value of surrounding property. Look at the condition of things here. We find two depots already in the very heart of the city, their tracks running through our principal streets, and the depot and tracks of one of them located upon a Government reservation, for which the railroad company pays no rental whatever into the Treasury.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, proposes only to authorize the commissioners of this District to examine the railroads of the city, their routes, and the location of their depots, and if in their judgment these can be located, or if they can find a proper location for them, so that they may be brought into one depot, then they are to report the facts to the House for future action. If they find it is more desirable that there shall be two depots, they are to report that fact to the House. But their report does nothing else; it contemplates no change in the present condition of affairs unless favorable action is taken by Congress. Their report has neither legislative force nor power to accomplish anything in that direction. After this report is made Congress will then take the recommendation of the commissioners and decide whether there shall be a union depot or whether there shall be two depots, or whether there shall be any change whatever, and permit them to remain as they are now. It is evident, then, that this bill fixes nothing. It simply looks to the question of obtaining information that may be valuable hereafter; but it contemplates nothing else. It is in the interest of this city to have this matter attended to at once; it is in the interest of its future growth and prosperity. This bill has nothing to do with the establishment of lines of roads or the location of their depots other than as I have stated. Manifestly it is improper that railroads centering here should be allowed to use Government reservations without being required to pay for them; nor should they be permitted to use the public streets or avenues of the city without the consent of Congress. All the railways coming into the city should be brought into one general union depot. This bill has in direct line of view the ultimate remedying of this condition of things. Will any man rise here and say that a union depot is not more convenient for the needs of the traveling public than two or three scattered over the city as at present? Will it be contended that passengers coming from the West desiring to go South, who are now compelled to get a transfer across the city and pay for it, and those who come from the South wishing to go West, who are compelled to do the same thing, will not find it more desirable and convenient to have all the roads centering at one point?

Will any sensible business man give it as his candid opinion that the interest of this great traveling public would be more enhanced by having these depots separate, as they now are, than by having one at a convenient location in the city where all of these roads shall center? I imagine not.

This bill once passed the House. It was called up a few evenings ago when the District of Columbia had the floor, and because it happened that there was no quorum in the House, the friends of the railroad companies arose in their places here and objected to its consideration, and said if pressed for consideration they would raise the question of a quorum. Thus they have succeeded in defeating a vote upon it; and one of the questions here presented is for this House to decide whether it means to legislate or whether it can legislate for the needs and necessities of the city of Washington as it is and as it will be in the future, or whether the railroad companies which center here shall have the power upon this floor to prevent action upon such measures. That is a matter, Mr. Speaker, which this House is called upon to settle this morning.

I have thus hurriedly given all there is in this bill. It will be seen that there is nothing hurtful, harmful, or objectionable in it on the ground that gentlemen allege. I say it passed the House. It went to the Senate and the Senate amended it; but a long time has elapsed since it passed the Senate, and the date has passed when the commissioners were to report. That must be corrected. For that reason I have moved that the report and amendments of the Senate be nonconcurred in, in order that a committee of conference may be appointed to decide upon this question. I now yield five minutes to the chairman of the committee, [Mr. HUNTON.]

Mr. HUNTON. I hope the gentleman will yield first to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] who desires a little time on this question.

Mr. MILLER. Then I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will not concur in this amendment, and that the committee of conference will be appointed. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HENKLE] has well stated that a number of the cities of this Union are endeavoring to get their railroads nearer their central points on account of increased business facilities. I grant you that is a fact; but I do not conceive that there is a city in the Union, if it had the power, that would not remove a railroad that cuts its fairest park right through the center, that would not compel that railroad, if it sought to reach the center of the town, to approach it either by an underground passage or by one overhead. This plan is being adopted in the city of Philadelphia at the present time at an expense of millions of dollars. The Pennsylvania railroad is entering the center of that city by a causeway erected over the tops of the houses. No large city in the Union would permit these roads to cross public streets and parks, marring the beauty of the city, as the city of Washington permits. No city like this, which is large to-day and likely to be larger, would tolerate such a railroad system as we now have in existence here.

We are here legislating for this, the capital of a nation. We are not legislating either for or against the interest of any railroad. A stranger from any part of the Union who comes and stands in front of this Capitol, and looks down through what ought to be the fairest park on earth, from the foot of the Capitol grounds to the Potomac, a mile long, which should be reserved for purposes of pleasure and transit from one end of the city to the other, cannot fail to see how terribly it is marred and its usefulness interfered with by having, almost every hour of the twenty-four, long trains of cars standing across the grounds, making it almost impossible to pass; or if you do pass, you do it at the risk of life and limb.

Now I do not object to having a central depot somewhere, but I want to submit that question to the commissioners of the District, who have the interests of the District in charge. I am satisfied they will not locate the depot so that the citizens of Washington shall be put to inconvenience. But representing here a constituency whose chief interest in this matter, as is the case with the constituencies of other gentlemen here, is to promote the beauty and greatness of this capital rather than the interest of any railroad, I say I will vote for any measure—largely interested as some of my people may be in the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad—I will vote for any measure which will restore that fair reservation to the purposes for which it was originally intended. It was never intended for railroad purposes, and I trust this House will take measures by this bill to do something for its restoration.

Mr. MILLER. I now call the previous question.

The question being taken on ordering the previous question there were—ayes 69, noes 12.

Mr. CONGER. A quorum has not voted. There does not seem to be interest enough taken in this subject to warrant the pressing of the measure any further.

Mr. MILLER. It seems those on the side of the gentleman from Michigan opposing this measure are not interested enough to vote.

The SPEAKER. The point having been made that a quorum has not voted the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. CONGER, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. MILLER.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes 26: no quorum voting.

Mr. HUNTON. If the gentleman from Michigan insists on the point of a quorum we may as well have a call of the House.

Mr. MILLER. I believe we could get a quorum by calling for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is a quorum present.

Mr. CONGER. I will withdraw the point of a quorum not having voted on this bill, although I doubt whether there is a quorum present. I will let it go because this vote does not pass the bill. But I think to legislate in this way with no quorum is a very improper way to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair concurs with the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WHITE. I insist on the point that a quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places.

The counted was resumed; and the tellers reported—ayes 113, noes 37.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and ask for a committee of conference.

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that in the opinion of the Chair the "ayes" had it.

Mr. HENKLE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUNTON. I hope the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HENKLE] will not delay the business of the committee by calling for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 12; not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHURCH PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. No. 6324) to construe an act entitled "An act to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia and to clear the title of the trustees of such property."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the words "church property which was actually held and used for the purposes of divine worship" in the first section of the act entitled "An act to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia and to clear the title of the trustees to such property," approved June 21, 1879, shall be construed to include parsonages and rectories.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill (H. R. No. 6719) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as managers of the conference on the part of the Senate Mr. WITHERS, Mr. EATON, and Mr. BLAINE.

CAPITOL AND NORTH O STREET RAILROAD.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I now call up from the House Calendar for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7032) to amend the act incorporating the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railroad Company.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act to incorporate the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company, approved March 3, 1875, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize said company, at its discretion, to remove its track from Ohio avenue and Twelfth street southwest, and lay a single or double track, and run its cars thereon, from its present line at the intersection of Ohio avenue and Fourteenth street south along Fourteenth street to C street southwest, eastwardly along C street southwest to Virginia avenue, to connect with its present line at the junction of said avenue and street; and also to lay a single or double track from its present line on P street and Eleventh street northwest, north along said Eleventh street to Boundary street; and to lay a single or double track commencing at the intersection of C street and Eleventh street southwest, running thence south on Eleventh street to Water street south, running thence easterly on Water street south to M street south, which point shall be the southern terminus of the road: Provided, That the said company shall complete the tracks and run its cars along the streets named within six months from the approval of this act.

SEC. 2. That should any part of the track extension herein authorized coincide with portions of any other duly incorporated street railway, the relative condition of the chartered rights may be adjusted upon terms to be mutually agreed upon between the companies, or, in case of disagreement, by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, on petition filed therein by either party, and on such notice to the other party as the court may order.

SEC. 3. That the fare between the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the nearest junction with connecting roads shall be two cents.

SEC. 4. That any other duly incorporated street railway company in the District of Columbia shall have the right to run its cars over that portion of the route hereinbefore named south of Pennsylvania avenue, upon such fair and equitable terms as may be agreed upon between the said companies; and in the event that the said companies shall fail to agree upon satisfactory terms, either of said companies may apply by petition to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which shall provide for proper notice to, and hearing of, all parties in interest; and shall have power to determine the terms and conditions upon which, and the regulations under which, the said company or companies using the tracks over the route before named may use and enjoy said tracks, and the amount and manner of compensation to be paid therefor.

SEC. 5. That Congress may at any time amend, alter, or repeal this act.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to move an amendment in section 3 of the bill, to strike out the words "connecting roads" and to insert in lieu thereof "any intersecting road."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the vote to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD, WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HUNTON. I now yield to the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. MARTIN,] a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I call up from the House Calendar for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. No. 7031) to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized to construct and lay down a double-track railroad, with the necessary switches and turn-tables, in the city of Washington, in said District, commencing at the intersection of New York avenue and Fourteenth street west, and running south along said Fourteenth street to the north line of C street south, which shall be the southern terminus of said road.

SEC. 2. That, except as herein otherwise provided, the construction, use, and maintenance of said road shall be subject to the provisions of the act, and of the acts amendatory thereof, incorporating the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That the other duly incorporated street railroad companies in the District of Columbia, or any of them, are hereby authorized and empowered to connect their tracks with the tracks of the said road, when completed, and to use the said road in common with the Metropolitan Railroad Company: Provided, That before any company shall connect its tracks with the tracks of the said road and use the said road as aforesaid, it shall give ten days' notice to the company or companies using the road, and pay to the said company or companies its share of the whole cost of building the road, so that the companies using the road in common shall share the said cost equally; and, further, shall bear its equal share of the expense of maintaining the road in good order, quarterly accounts of the said expense to be rendered by the Metropolitan Railroad Company.

SEC. 4. That every railroad company using the road herein authorized shall carry passengers from any point along the said road to any point upon any of the lines operated by said company, receiving therefor a rate of fare not exceeding its usual rate for carriage upon its main lines; and shall carry passengers for any distance between the termini of the road herein authorized, receiving therefor a rate of fare not exceeding two cents per passenger.

SEC. 5. That unless the Metropolitan Railroad Company shall commence work on the said road by the 1st day of April, 1881, and complete the said road by the 1st day of June, 1881, then any other of the duly incorporated street railroad companies of the District of Columbia which shall first file with the commissioners of the District of Columbia a notification of intention so to do may proceed, in place of the Metropolitan Railroad Company, to construct and complete the said road; and the preceding sections of this act shall be construed as though the said company were named therein instead of the Metropolitan Railroad Company.

SEC. 6. That whenever the road herein authorized may coincide with the route of any other duly incorporated street railroad company in the District of Columbia, the said Metropolitan Railroad Company shall have the right to use the tracks already laid as part of the road herein authorized to be constructed, upon such fair and equitable terms as may be agreed upon by said companies; and in the event of the said companies failing to agree upon satisfactory terms, either of said companies may appeal by a petition to the supreme court of the Distict of Columbia, which shall provide for proper notice to and hearing of all parties interested, and shall have power to determine the terms and conditions upon which the said tracks shall be used.

SEC. 7. That Congress may at any time amend, alter, or repeal this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON AND CHESAPEAKE RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HUNTON. I now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. SLEMONS.]

Mr. SLEMONS. I call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. No. 7117) authorizing the Washington and Chesapeake Railroad Company to extend its railroad into and within the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it is represented to this present Congress that the Washington and Chesapeake Railroad Company, organized under the provisions of article 41 of the revised code, 1878, of the State of Maryland, desire to extend their railroad into and within the District of Columbia: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Washington and Chesapeake Railroad Company be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered, as hereinafter provided, to extend their railroad into and within the District of Columbia; and the said Washington and Chesapeake Railroad Company shall have and exercise the authority herein conferred subject to the provisions, and with the rights, powers, duties, and liabilities imposed by chapter 18, class 7, of the Revised Statutes of the United States relative to the District of Columbia, and acts in amendment thereof and in addition thereto.

SEC. 2. That said Washington and Chesapeake Railroad Company, in passing into the cities of Washington or Georgetown, shall be authorized to build a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River at or near the foot of Virginia avenue; and their line shall follow along Virginia avenue, southeast, from said bridge to an intersection with the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad at or near the eastern end of their tunnel, and there form a junction with the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, or shall pass along, or through, or across such street or streets, or alleys, as may be hereafter allowed by the Congress of the United States upon presentation of survey and map of the proposed location of said Washington and Chesapeake Railroad.

SEC. 3. That unless the said company shall commence the construction of said road within two years, and complete the same, with at least one set of tracks, within five years from the passage of this act, then this act and all rights and privileges hereby granted shall cease and determine.

SEC. 4. That the said Washington and Chesapeake Railroad Company shall establish no depot within the limits of the city of Washington without the consent in writing of the commissioners of the District of Columbia; but they may temporarily occupy, upon such terms as they may agree upon, the depot buildings of any railroad company now having such buildings erected within the limits of the city of Washington: Provided, That when the Congress of the United States or other lawful authority shall provide for the erection and occupancy of a union depot building, the said Washington and Chesapeake Railroad Company shall unite in the erection and occupancy of such depot building, upon such terms and in such manner as may be therefor lawfully provided.

SEC. 5. That this act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SLEMONS. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to move to amend section 2 of the bill, in lines 2 and 3, by striking out the words "cities of Washington or Georgetown," and inserting the words "city of Washington." Also, to insert as section 5 of the bill that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That before the Washington and Chesapeake Railroad Company aforesaid shall proceed to construct any railroad which they may lay out or locate under the provisions of this act, they shall first construct all that portion of said railroad in the State of Maryland before any portion of the line shall be constructed in the District of Columbia, as provided for in this act.

Make section 5 of the bill read "section 6," &c.

The question was upon agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

Mr. PRICE. I have listened to the reading of this bill quite carefully, and do not discover that there is any provision in it for guarding the streets. I would inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill if it gives to this railroad company the power to lay its tracks along the streets of the city——

Mr. HUNTON. For only a short distance, just beyond the Navy Yard. It comes into the District on one of the avenues there, and then it strikes the line of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad.

Mr. PRICE. And gives to this railroad company the right to use the street without the consent of the property holders along the street?

Mr. HUNTON. The property holders have no interest in the streets; they belong to the Federal Government.

Mr. PRICE. I know that. But I have seen a great deal of this sort of thing. Parties purchase property because it is on a street, and they have the right of ingress to and egress from their property. Now if you allow a railroad company to lay a track along the street, and to lower or raise the grade of the street without the consent of the parties owning the adjacent property——

Mr. HUNTON. I beg your pardon; the District of Columbia commissioners would not allow that.

Mr. PRICE. That is what I want to find out.

Mr. HUNTON. They will have the right to occupy the streets, just as every other railroad that comes into the city has now; on no better and on no worse terms. There has been no objection raised to this railroad by the people of the vicinity. It will occupy only about a hundred yards of the street.

Mr. PRICE. There is a law restricting——

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir. I said the authorities of the District of Columbia would not allow the railroad to interfere with the grade of the street.

Mr. PRICE. There is a law now to that effect?

Mr. HUNTON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PRICE. That is what I want to find out. The bill does not contain any such provision; but if there is a law covering that point and protecting the rights of the property holders, it may be all right.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SLEMONS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOUTHERN MARYLAND RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HUNTON. I now yield to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HENKLE.]

Mr. HENKLE. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 6659) to authorize the Southern Maryland Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia, and to ask for its consideration at this time.

Mr. ROBESON. I make a point of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. ROBESON. My point of order is that the bill makes an appropriation of public property, and should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, and then the Chair will rule upon the point of order.

Mr. HENKLE. I think the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole will meet the objections of the gentleman from New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. The bill and the proposed amendments will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it is represented to this present Congress that the Southern Railroad Company, organized under the provisions of the act of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland entitled "An act to incorporate the Southern Maryland Railroad Company," approved March 20, 1868, desire to extend their railroad into and within the District of Columbia: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Southern Maryland Railroad Company shall be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to extend their railroad into and within the District of Columbia, to form a junction with the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, and the Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, outside of the city of Washington; and the said Southern Maryland Railroad Company are hereby authorized to exercise the same powers, rights, and privileges, and be subject to the same restrictions, in the extension and construction of their said railroad into and within the said District, as they may exercise or are subject to under the said act of the General Assembly of Maryland, approved March 20, 1868, in the construction and operation of their railroad within the State of Maryland; and shall be entitled to the same rights, compensation, benefits, and immunities in the use of said road, and in regard thereto, as are provided in said act of the General Assembly of Maryland, it being expressly understood that the said Southern Maryland Railroad Company shall have power to construct only one railroad within the said District.

SEC. 2. That before the Southern Maryland Railroad Company aforesaid shall proceed to construct any railroad which they may lay out or locate on, through, or over any land or improvements, or use, or take for use, any earth, stone, or other materials necessary for the construction of said road, on any land within the said District, they shall first obtain the assent of the owner of such land, improvements, or materials, or if such owner shall be absent from said District, or shall refuse to give such assent on such terms as the said company shall approve, or because of infancy, coverture, insanity, or any other cause shall be legally incapable of giving such assent, then it shall be lawful for the said company to apply to a justice of the peace of the county of Washington, who shall thereupon issue his warrant, under his hand and seal, directed to the marshal of the said District, requiring him to summon a jury of twelve citizens of the said District, none of whom shall be interested, or related to any person interested, in the land or materials required for the construction of the said railroad, or a stockholder, or related to any stockholder, in the said company, to meet on the land, or near to the other property or materials so required, on a day named in such warrant, not less than ten nor more than twenty days after issuing the same, to proceed to value the damages which the owner or owners of any such land or other property will sustain by the use or occupation of the same required by the said company; and the proceedings, duty, and authority of the said marshal in regard to such warrant and jury, and the oath or affirmation to be administered, and inquisition to be made and returned, shall be the same as are directed and authorized in regard to the sheriff by the sixteenth section of the said act of the General Assembly of Maryland approved March 20, 1868; and all other proceedings in regard to such jury, and the estimation and valuation of damages, and the payment, or tender of payment, of any damages ascertained by such valuation and effect thereof, and of the view of any lands, or other property or materials, as to giving the said company a right to use the same for the use or construction of their railroad within the said District, as hereby authorized, shall in every case and every respect be the same as is provided in and by the beforementioned act of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland in regard to any railroad to be constructed by the Southern Maryland Railroad Company in the State of Maryland: Provided, That whenever, by the said act, the inquisition of the jury is required to be returned to the clerk of the circuit court, to be confirmed by said court at its next session, if not sufficient cause to the contrary be shown, the inquisition or inquisitions under this act shall be returned by the marshal to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which court shall have the same jurisdiction and powers over the subject-matter as the said circuit court has under the act of the General Assembly of Maryland aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That in all cases where a condemnation and valuation of lands or materials shall have been made under section 2 of this act, either party may appeal to the supreme court of the District of Columbia within thirty days from the rendition of the verdict of the jury; and in all cases where the said company shall take an appeal they shall give bond to the party or parties claiming and entitled to damages in a penalty at least double the sum found by the jury, with a condition that the said company shall pay, or cause to be paid, such amount of damages and costs as the party or parties may be entitled to receive on the judgment of the said supreme court, without delay, and on which bond ample and sufficient sureties shall be given, to be approved by the said supreme court; and in all cases where the party or parties claimant shall appeal, the said company, if it shall require the immediate use of the property condemned and valued as aforesaid, before an appeal can be heard or decided, may execute and tender a bond to the party or parties aforesaid in at least double the sum found by the jury, with sureties to be approved by the supreme court of said District, and with a condition to pay without delay such sum and costs as may be awarded by the said court; and upon the delivery or tender of such bond the said company may proceed to the construction of their said road as if the party or parties claimant and the said company had agreed upon the compensation to be paid for the property to be used; and that in all cases where the said company shall appeal and give bond as aforesaid, they may have the power to proceed in the construction of their road, and appropriation of the property for the uses thereof, as if no appeal had been taken and the parties had agreed upon the compensation for the property required.

SEC. 4. That whenever the said company, in the construction of their railroad within the said District as authorized by this act, shall find it necessary to cross or intersect any established road, street, or other way, it shall be the duty of said company so to construct the said railroad across such established road, street, or other way as not to impede the passage or transportation of persons or property along the same; and where it shall be necessary to pass the said railroad through the land of any individual within the said District, it shall be the duty of said company to provide for such individual wagon-ways across the said railroad as may be necessary and proper from one part of his land to another; but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize the said company to enter upon any lot or square, or part thereof, owned by the United States, within the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, for the purpose of locating or constructing the said railroad, or for the purpose of excavating the same, or taking therefrom any materials, or for any other purposes and uses whatsoever; but the said company, in passing into said cities of Washingtown or Georgetown, shall pass along or through, or across, such street or streets or alleys as may be hereafter allowed by the Congress of the United States, upon presentation of survey and map of proposed location of said road; and the said Southern Maryland Railroad Company may connect within said District with any railroad or canal company chartered, or hereafter to be chartered, by such route or routes within said District as have been, or may be hereafter, determined by Congress, and upon such terms as may be agreed upon by the said companies respectively.

SEC. 5. That the said Southern Maryland Railroad Company may charge and receive for tolls and transportation on all that part of said road within the District of Columbia a rate not to exceed eight cents per ton per mile; and the said company may charge and receive for taking up and setting down any passenger or traveler within said District, conveyed a shorter distance than four miles, a sum not exceeding twenty cents.

SEC. 6. That the said company are also hereby authorized and empowered to make such special contract with any duly authorized officer or agent of the United States for the conveyance of the mail or the transportation of persons or property for the use of the United States on any railroad which shall be constructed by the said company, on such terms as shall be approved of by the competent officer or authority, and to receive such compensation so agreed for according to the terms of such contract.

SEC. 7. That unless the said company shall commence the construction of said road within two years, and complete the same, with at least one set of tracks, within three years from the passage of this act, then this act and all rights and privileges hereby granted shall cease and determine.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. COX.) The amendments proposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia will now be read.

The first amendment was, in section 1 of the bill, to strike out all after the words "and the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That said Southern Maryland Railroad Company shall exercise the authority conferred by this act subject to the provisions and with all the rights, powers, duties, and liabilities imposed by chapter 18, class 7 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia in relation to railroad companies, and all acts in amendment thereof or in addition thereto.

The next amendment was to strike out sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. That before the Southern Maryland Railroad Company aforesaid shall proceed to construct any railroad which they may lay out or locate under the provisions of this act, they shall first construct all that portion of said railroad in the State of Maryland before any portion of the line shall be constructed in the District of Columbia as provided for in this act.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Let the bill be read as amended.

Mr. WHITE. Right here I desire to ask a question. Did my ears deceive me, or not? I thought I heard a provision allowing this railroad company to charge eight cents per ton per mile.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. That is stricken out.

Mr. HUNTON. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] will wait till all the amendments are read, no doubt all his objections will be met.

Mr. WHITE. How is it about the Soldiers' Home? Will this railroad go through the grounds of the Home?

Mr. HUNTON. If the gentleman will wait he will be satisfied on that point.

Mr. WHITE. Cannot the gentleman answer me now? I am very impatient.

Mr. HUNTON. There is no intention to encroach on the grounds of the Soldiers' Home, but to make the matter entirely certain an amendment has been prepared and accepted prohibiting the company from making any such encroachment.

Mr. WHITE. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Let the bill as amended be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill as proposed to be amended. When the first section had been read,

Mr. CLYMER said: If the Clerk has read correctly the section as amended, the words "outside the city of Washington" are omitted after the provision authorizing a junction with the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad and the Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. I desire to ask why this has been done.

Mr. HENKLE. That was not the intention. If those words have been left out, it is a mistake.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask that the section be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Southern Maryland Railroad Company shall be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to extend their railroad into and within the District of Columbia to form a junction with the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad and the Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal: Provided——

Mr. CLYMER. Now, after the words "Chesapeake and Ohio Canal" the words "outside the city of Washington," which are in the original bill, are omitted in this amendment. I desire to have them inserted.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Those words should be inserted.

Mr. CLYMER. Let the first amendment be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 1, line 18, strike out from the words "Chesapeake and Ohio Canal" to the end of the section.

Mr. CLYMER. That strikes out the words "outside of the city of Washington."

Mr. HENKLE. Let the amendment be amended so as to reinsert those words.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. In the bill as agreed to by the committee the words "outside of the city of Washington" are inserted, in the fifth line, after the words "District of Columbia."

Mr. CLYMER. The fact is a bill of this kind ought to be printed before we are asked to consider it. A bill in manuscript giving these enormous privileges ought not to be put through in this way.

Mr. HENKLE. I wish to submit a few words of explanation which may unravel all the confusion about this bill. If the words "outside of the city of Washington" have by inadvertence or clerical error been omitted, I move an amendment to insert them.

Now, in explanation of the general provisions of the bill——

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. The Clerk is not yet through with the reading of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If the bill is open to amendment, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I ask that the Clerk finish the reading of the bill, so that we may see whether the bill as amended conforms to the action of the committee.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill as proposed to be amended.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I wish to offer an amendment to the first section.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HENKLE] will allow me to call attention to the fact that an additional section was agreed to by the committee, reserving the right of Congress to alter, repeal, or amend the act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the first section the following:

"Provided, also, That nothing herein shall authorize or empower said railroad company to extend its road through any of the lands or grounds occupied as a soldiers' home or as a national cemetery."

Mr. CLYMER. I move further to amend by adding "or any other public reservation of the United States."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No further amendment is in order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I think this amendment will commend itself to the committee and to the House.

Mr. ROBESON. I move to amend by adding to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois "or other public reservation."

Mr. HENKLE. Without the consent of Congress.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I accept the amendment.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman from New York suggests I put in "public property."

Mr. LAPHAM. I have an amendment, which I will send up as a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall authorize said company to enter upon or take for its purposes any cemetery or any part of the property known as the Soldiers' Home or any other real property or reservation occupied by or belonging to the United States.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. As that has been carefully prepared by a distinguished lawyer of this House, I will accept it as a modification of my amendment.

The amendment, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I move to add as an additional section at the end of the bill "that Congress reserves the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act."

Mr. VALENTINE. Has the Clerk read the whole of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been read through.

Mr. ROBESON. I should like to ask the gentleman whether this is the bill which the committee agreed to?

Mr. HENKLE. It is, with the exception of the amendments which have been adopted.

Mr. ROBESON. I understand from the copy presented to me in manuscript it is not the bill which the committee agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALDRICH,] which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to offer another amendment to this bill, to come in that section which provides that this railroad shall exercise its powers subject to the provisions of the general railroad law of the District. I wish just at that place to put in the following amendment, after the word "thereof."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will have to indicate the section to which he wishes to introduce his amendment.

Mr. ROBESON. Nobody can tell from the way in which the bill is before the House.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. It is the first section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the section, and the gentleman will indicate where he proposes to move his amendment.

Mr. ROBESON. It is an amendment to the first section, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 1, eighth line, strike out all from the word "Washington" to the end of the section and insert:

Provided, That said Southern Maryland Railroad Company shall exercise the authority conferred by this act subject to the provisions and with all the rights, powers, duties, and liabilities imposed by chapter 18, clause 7 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia in relation to railroad companies.

Mr. ROBESON. After the word "companies" I desire to insert the words "including section No. 673 of said act."

Mr. HENKLE. I am willing to accept that.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENKLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EIGHT PER CENT. IMPROVEMENT CERTIFICATES.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back the bill (S. No. 1681) to provide for refunding the 8 per cent. improvement certificates of the District of Columbia, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Senate bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Treasurer of the United States, as ex officio commissioner of the sinking fund of the District of Columbia, is hereby authorized and required to cause bonds of the District of Columbia to be prepared, in sums of $50 and $500, bearing date August 1, 1874, payable fifty years after date, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, to be signed by said Treasurer as ex officio sinking-fund commissioner, and countersigned by the comptroller of said District, and sealed as the said Treasurer may direct; which bonds shall be exempt from taxation by Federal, State, or municipal authority, engraved or printed at the expense of the District of Columbia, and in form not inconsistent herewith. And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations, and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity. Said bonds shall be numbered consecutively, beginning with the number next to the last bond that was issued under the ninth section of the act approved June 16, 1880, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes," and shall be registered in the office of the comptroller of said District and in the office of the Register of the Treasury of the United States.

And the Treasurer of the United States, as ex officio sinking-fund commissioner of the District of Columbia, is hereby authorized to exchange said bonds at par, after detaching the coupons from the same up to the date of such exchange, for like sums of the 8 per cent. certificates of said District and the accrued interest thereon, issued under act of the Legislative Assembly of said District, approved May 29, 1873, and shall cause the said certificates, upon redemption, to be duly canceled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

That the Treasurer of the United States, as ex officio commissioner of the sinking fund of the District of Columbia, is hereby authorized and required to cause notes of the District of Columbia to be prepared, not to exceed $810,000 in amount, in sums of $50 and $500, bearing date March 1, 1881, payable at any time after one year and within five years from the date thereof, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, to be signed by said Treasurer as ex officio sinking-fund commissioner, and countersigned by the comptroller of said District, and sealed as the said Treasurer may direct; which notes shall be exempt from taxation by or under Federal, State, or municipal authorities, engraved or printed at the expense of the District of Columbia, and in form not inconsistent herewith; said notes shall be numbered consecutively, and lettered with a letter not now borne by any bonds or certificates of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That the said Treasurer of the United States, as ex officio sinking-fund commissioner of the District of Columbia, is hereby authorized to exchange said notes at par for like sums of the 8 per cent. certificates of said District, and the accrued interest thereon, issued under the act of the Legislative Assembly of said District approved May 29, 1873, and shall cause said certificates, upon redemption, to be canceled; and all interest upon said certificates shall cease and determine on and after said 1st day of March, 1881.

SEC. 3. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall proceed in the manner now provided for by law, or which may hereafter be provided for, without delay, to collect the amounts due on the certificates of assessments for special improvements, which certificates, and all payments thereon, are, by the provisions of said act of said Legislative Assembly approved May 29, 1873, held and pledged for the payment and redemption of said 8 per cent. certificates, which said special assessments when so collected shall constitute a sinking fund for the payment of the notes issued under the provisions of this act; and as rapidly as the sum of $10,000 is received by said Treasurer, as said sinking-fund commissioner, he shall purchase or call in and redeem and cancel said notes, in such way and manner as he may determine, reserving, however, of said moneys so collected and received sufficient amounts to pay off and discharge the interest coupons attached to said notes next to become due and payable: Provided, That the officers of the District of Columbia are hereby prohibited from revising or reducing the amount of any special assessment for street improvements, paid or unpaid, and all provisions of law granting authority for such revision and abatement and for the issue of drawback certificates in the adjustment of any such special assessments are hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. That the principal and interest of the notes authorized by this act shall be subject to all the pledges of faith and exemptions as the bonds authorized by section 7 of the act approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;" and whenever the funds derived from special assessments in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States are insufficient to pay any installment of interest upon said notes about to become due and payable the Secretary of the Treasury shall advance to the said Treasurer, upon his requisition, the additional amount necessary to pay said installment of interest when due and payable; and all amounts so advanced shall be credited as a part of the appropriation for the year by the United States toward the expenses of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That if in the opinion of the said Treasurer it will be more advantageous to the District of Columbia to sell or otherwise dispose of the said notes and apply the proceeds of said sale to the payment of said 8 per cent. certificates as aforesaid, with the interest thereon, according to their tenor and effect, then power and authority is hereby conferred upon said Treasurer to make sale thereof, at not less than par, in such ways and for such sums as he may deem for the best interests of the said District of Columbia.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this bill must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole under the third clause of the twenty-third rule of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman indicate that part of the bill to which he objects?

Mr. McMILLIN. The section of the rule to which I refer reads:

3. All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole, and a point of order under this rule shall be good at any time before the consideration of a bill has commenced.

Now, this bill provides for the funding of some outstanding indebtedness of the District of Columbia. The fourth section of the bill provides:

That the principal and interest of the notes authorized by this act shall be subject to all the pledges of faith and exemptions as the bonds authorized by section 7 of the act approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;" and whenever the funds derived from special assessments in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States are insufficient to pay any installment of interest upon said notes about to become due and payable, the Secretary of the Treasury shall advance to the said Treasurer, upon his requisition, the additional amount necessary to pay said installment of interest when due and payable; and all amounts so advanced shall be credited as a part of the appropriation for the year by the United States toward the expenses of the District of Columbia.

Now, I think that clearly authorizes the payment of money out of the Treasury of the United States, and under the section of the twenty-third rule, to which I have referred, it must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

I think it is time, Mr. Speaker, for the Government of the United States to put a stop to burdening itself further by assuming indebtedness of the District of Columbia and by becoming responsible for indebtedness other than that which is now by law required to be paid by the General Government. I make the point of order, therefore, that this should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. NEAL. No, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would sustain the point of order upon the ground——

Mr. BUCKNER. Before deciding the point of order I would like to say a word in response to the point made by the gentleman from Tennessee. I think an examination of this section of the bill will show that my friend is clearly mistaken in supposing that there is any appropriation whatever provided for here or assumed by the General Government that has not been already appropriated for in a bill already passed by this House for the District of Columbia. There is a general law covering the case in point where the Government provides one-half, and one-half is appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia. The District raises year by year under a general law one-half of this fund. Now, this provision that the gentleman from Tennessee calls attention to is simply a change of an appropriation already made and a mere temporary change.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have examined this carefully and am satisfied that it comes within the objection which I have made against it.

Mr. BUCKNER. But the appropriation in this case is already made, the gentleman will observe. The bill making that appropriation has been already acted upon in Committee of the Whole, and therefore there can be no necessity now for making the point of order that the House shall go into Committee of the Whole on the proposition again, because, as I have stated, the money has been appropriated under a general law.

Mr. CLYMER. By no means; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BUCKNER. It is appropriated under a general law.

Mr. CLYMER. Permit me to say in response to the gentleman from Missouri that there is a provision contained in the second section of this bill which proposes to provide for the payment of a certain class of certificates issued under the authority of the old Legislative Assembly of this District which under our former legislation in this House has been, so to speak, spewed out of the mouth of the General Government.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman from Tennessee made his point of order and I was replying to his objection to the fourth section as I understood him to refer to that particularly.

Mr. CLYMER. If the gentleman will read section 2 he will see that it does provide to pay for this class of indebtedness, a general indebtedness, to which I have referred.

Mr. BUCKNER. The section which the gentleman from Tennessee referred to, section 4, provides for the payment of interest and principal of the notes authorized by this act to be issued and which has been already authorized under the act of June 20, 1874, but only under certain specific conditions named in this section.

Mr. CLYMER. That is true, but these notes are guaranteed by the Government of the United States.

Mr. BUCKNER. Now, in reference to the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee to this fourth section my response was that the general law already covers this.

Mr. McMILLIN. The general law does not provide for burdening the General Government with any further indebtedness of the District of Columbia, and the point that I make is that this bill, which proposes to accomplish that, must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUCKNER. I think the gentleman is mistaken, for the reason that this appropriation has been already made for the present fiscal year.

Mr. McMILLIN. I called the attention of the House to that clause, as that section requires payments of money out of the Treasury under certain conditions; but, taking the whole bill together, my point of order applies to it all, for the gentleman will see by the terms of this second section, when read in connection with the fourth section, that we obligate the Government of the United States to pay the interest on a class of indebtedness which, in the language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, this Government has heretofore "spewed out of its mouth." I will read this second section. It provides:

That the said Treasurer of the United States, as ex-officio sinking-fund commissioner of the District of Columbia, is hereby authorized to exchange said notes at par for like sums of the 8 per cent. certificates of said District, and the accrued interest thereon, issued under the act of the Legislative Assembly of said District approved May 29, 1873, and shall cause said certificates, upon redemption, to be canceled; and all interest upon said certificates shall cease and determine on and after said 1st day of March, 1881.

Now, if the District fails to pay the interest on this indebtedness, the Treasurer is required, under the fourth section of this bill, to do it; and that is the objection I make to the bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. As far as that is concerned, the point that I make against the gentleman's question of order is that the fund is already appropriated.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then you do not need this act to help you.

Mr. BUCKNER. That is a different sort of a thing. The gentleman's point is because this appropriates money out of the Treasury it is not in order, and that it should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. My response to that was that the money had heretofore been appropriated, or has been already appropriated, and is now appropriated under the general law, by which we provide for one-half of the indebtedness of the District, and appropriate the remaining half out of the revenues arising from the taxation on the property of the District itself. Now, this provision is nothing more than a mere temporary use of that particular fund for this purpose. It is no payment of either principal or interest, for all of these are governed by the same law.

Mr. CLYMER. I think the gentleman is mistaken in his view of the point of order. The law provides for an appropriation to be made, but not specifically for such a purpose. I would ask him if we do not every year, and in every appropriation bill for the District of Columbia, always have to go into Committee of the Whole to consider it?

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to read on that point what this bill says. It says:

The Secretary of the Treasury shall advance to the said treasurer upon his requisition the additional amount necessary to pay said installment of interest when due and payable; and all amounts so advanced shall be credited as a part of the appropriation for the year by the United States toward the expenses of the District of Columbia.

Showing this is a part of the appropriation already made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair listened to the gentleman from Missouri, but had already decided the point of order under the third section of the twenty-third rule, the language of which is as follows:

All proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole.

In the fourth section of the substitute here proposed, beginning at line 6, it is provided:

Whenever the funds derived from special assessments in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States are insufficient to pay any installment of interest upon said notes about to become due and payable, the Secretary of the Treasury shall advance to the said Treasurer, upon his requisition, the additional amount necessary to pay said installment of interest when due and payable.

This certainly touches appropriations and provides for appropriations hereafter to be made. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. NEAL. Now I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering this bill. Pending that motion I move that all general debate be limited——

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman cannot do that until there has been general debate in committee.

Mr. NEAL. Very well.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering certain bills. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for the bill (S. No. 1681) to provide for funding the 8 per cent. improvement certificates of the District of Columbia.

Mr. NEAL. I move that the first and formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is now open for debate and amendment.

Mr. NEAL. There are outstanding what are called 8 per cent. certificates issued by the board of public works to the amount of about $800,000. I ask the attention of the committee while I enter into some details regarding these certificates.

The Forty-first Congress of the United States passed an act approved February 13, 1871, entitled "An act to provide a Government for the District of Columbia," and among other things provided in said act for a board of public works to be appointed by the President of the United States, thus creating this board to all intents and purposes Federal officers. The act in its thirty-seventh section authorizes them—

To have the entire control of, and make all regulations that they shall deem necessary for keeping in repair, the streets, avenues, alleys, and sewers of the city, and all other works which may be intrusted to their charge by the legislative assembly or Congress. To disburse upon their warrant all moneys, appropriated by the United States, or the District of Columbia, or collected from property holders in pursuance of law, for the improvement of streets, avenues, alleys, and sewers, and roads and bridges; and shall assess, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law, upon the property adjoining, and to be especially benefited by the improvements authorized by law, and made by them, a reasonable proportion of the cost of the improvement, not exceeding one-third of such cost, which sum shall be collected as all other taxes are collected.

These officers were appointed by the President of the United States and paid out of the Federal Treasury. The people of the District had no control over them; nothing to say in regard to their action; they were at the mercy of these officers.

The board of public works went on and made improvements involving the expenditure, as everybody knows, of a large sum of money, and they made this city, so far as its streets, avenues, and public improvements are concerned, what it now is. They came in debt to contractors for work done in the amount of money which they had agreed to pay at the time the contracts were made. But when it became due the money was not collected, the contractors could not pay their men, and many of them actually suffered the sale of their property in order that they might pay their debts, because the board of public works did not fulfill their contracts with the contractors.

Then the Legislative Assembly, authorized by Congress, on the 29th May, 1873, passed an act, one of the provisions of which was as follows: The board of public works were—

Authorized to issue and to use solely in the discharge of outstanding obligations certificates of indebtedness for work done under the direction of the board, and chargeable to the private property benefited thereby, in denominations of $50 or any multiple of that sum, dated July 1, 1873, payable to bearer, with interest, semi-annually from July 1, 1873, at the rate of 8 per cent. * * * not exceeding $2,000,000.

These certificates, as they were called, these 8 per cent. certificates, were issued to the extent, I believe, of the full amount authorized by the board of public works. Of those certificates $1,200,000 have been redeemed from the collections upon the special assessments which were chargeable expressly by law for their redemption. The certificates were to be paid according to their terms, one-fifth at the end of every year until upon the expiration of five years the whole amount was to be redeemed of the outstanding certificates issued seven or eight years ago. No part of them has been redeemed in that way, and they are to-day drawing whatever rate of interest the accounting officers may determine that they are by law entitled to draw.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman permit me just here to ask him a question? I wish to understand this matter. Does he know who are the principal holders of these certificates?

Mr. NEAL. I know that a man named Baker, now connected with the First National Bank of New York, whose father is a large property-holder of this city, a Washington man, paid, as I am informed, ninety-seven cents on the dollar for a considerable portion of them. A Mr. Davis, a man who has come forward every year and has paid up his taxes and his special assessments, is holder of another considerable batch of them. A Mr. Lewis, I am told, also owns a considerable amount. And there are also other persons who hold them. A gentleman of the name of Ritchie, one of the contractors, I am told, owns a lot of them. I cannot say in whose hands they all are.

Mr. Baker, interested as he and his friends were in the city, bought a portion of these certificates, and paid for them ninety-seven cents on the dollar. That money was used by the board of public works for the purpose of paying the obligations of the District to its contractors, and was paid by the contractors to the men who did the work.

Mr. WARNER. Will my colleague [Mr. NEAL] permit me to interrupt him to ask a question?

Mr. NEAL. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. I understand there are about $800,000 of these 8 per cent. certificates outstanding.

Mr. NEAL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER. With back interest?

Mr. NEAL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER. For how many years?

Mr. NEAL. The whole amount outstanding of the certificates is $500,000. The amount $800,000 includes the principle and interest.

Mr. WARNER. For how many years?

Mr. NEAL. Since 1873, I suppose.

Mr. WARNER. Simple interest, not compounded?

Mr. NEAL. This bill is drawn and the amounts furnished by the Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. WARNER. And includes the amount of the original certificates now outstanding with the interest?

Mr. NEAL. Yes. There are some $500,000 of the certificates now outstanding; $1,500,000 of them have been paid.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. NEAL. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does not this bill make the Government liable for a species of indebtedness of the District of Columbia that it has not heretofore assumed?

Mr. NEAL. There is a legal question involved about that matter which lawyers may differ upon.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is your opinion about it?

Mr. NEAL. I will give you my opinion before I get through. These claims are in no different shape than all the claims upon the District of Columbia which have been heretofore funded. They are simply the remnants of District of Columbia claims which have been left unfunded. By an act of Congress passed at the last session $1,500,000 were funded; and the remainder were funded by an act which was passed before the gentleman and myself became members of this House.

Mr. BRAGG. Why were not these funded with the others?

Mr. CLYMER. Among these claims, are there any of those which were repudiated?

Mr. NEAL. Not one of them.

Mr. CLYMER. Were not a very large number of these claims said to be unjust, and were therefore not allowed?

Mr. NEAL. Those claims that were said to be unjust we have already referred, by an act of Congress, to the Court of Claims. Allow me to say to the Committee of the Whole that these 8 per cent. certificates were issued for money actually paid by the holders of them into the coffers of the District of Columbia and expended by the board of public works to pay contractors and their employés in the District.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NEAL. Certainly.

Mr. ATKINS. Are not these certificates a mere lien upon the land and other property of the District?

Mr. NEAL. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] will permit me to say so, I will reply to him that this is a question which, as I said before, lawyers may differ upon. Before I get through I will give my views so that nobody will mistake them.

Mr. ATKINS. If they are not a lien on the property of the District, what obligation is there upon the District or upon the Government of the United States to pay them?

Mr. NEAL. That is just exactly what I want to state before I get through.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry of him?

Mr. NEAL. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. If these are of the same class of certificates which have heretofore been funded, why were they not funded with the others? That is one question. Another is, if these are not a lien upon special property, why is it provided in this bill to repeal the law authorizing the commissioners of the District to reduce and correct estimates which are alleged to have been illegal?

Mr. NEAL. I will move that the committee now rise.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to move an amendment.

Mr. NEAL. I understand it is necessary for the committee to rise at this time in order that an important announcement may be made to the House.

The motion of Mr. NEAL was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (S. No. 1681) to provide for funding the 8 per cent. improvement certificates of the District of Columbia.

TEMPORARY POLICEMEN FOR THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have considered at this time a bill which it is important shall be passed at once. It is a bill making appropriations for the employment of temporary policemen in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the commissioners of the District of Columbia to appoint, upon the recommendation of the superintendent of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, three hundred additional privates on the Metropolitan police force of said District, for the period of fifteen days, from the 24th of February, 1881, to be paid $2 per day for each day's service rendered by them in that capacity, and that a sum sufficient for their payment and equipment be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BLAND. Is that by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLYMER. It is subject to a point of order.

Mr. HUNTON. I would suggest that gentlemen around me——

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a request touching the business of the Committee on the District of Columbia. In consequence of an announcement that the Chair will make in a moment, the Committee on the District of Columbia will be deprived of the remainder of to-day for the consideration of its business. The Chair suggests that consent be given that the committee be allowed two hours after the morning hour on Tuesday of next week for the consideration of its business.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that in all human probability he will not be present to-morrow; and he has therefore designated to act as Speaker pro tempore during his absence the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. BLACKBURN.

DEATH OF HON. FERNANDO WOOD.

The SPEAKER. It is the sad duty of the Chair to bring to the attention of the House the telegram which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOT SPRINGS, February 14, 1881.

To Hon. JORDAN E. CRAVENS, House of Representatives:

Hon. FERNANDO WOOD died here last night at nine o'clock.

S. A. STITT.

The SPEAKER. Mr. FERNANDO WOOD first entered this House as a member forty years ago; and if he had lived to the close of the Congress for which he was chosen, his term of service would have reached twenty years.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, on receiving this morning the rumor of the sad event which has just been announced, the members of the Committee on Ways and Means, over which Mr. WOOD presided for four years, waited for its authentication. Upon the intelligence being confirmed by the telegram which has just been read, the committee held a meeting, at which I was instructed to offer for the consideration of the House the resolutions which I now submit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep regret of the death of Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That a committee of nine members be appointed by the Speaker to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. WOOD; and that, as a mark of respect entertained by the House for his memory, his remains be removed from Hot Springs, Arkansas, to the city of New York in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms, attended by said committee, who shall have full power to carry this resolution into effect.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate the foregoing resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the House do now adjourn.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I rise to second the resolutions submitted by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.]

Death casts his baleful shadows across our Chamber. He appears in the very midst of our deliberations. He abruptly closes our legislative labors.

Although the sad tidings announced by you, sir, were not altogether unexpected, yet, after all, such messages never fail to startle us with their suddenness.

My colleague, who so recently left us, followed by so many sorrowful forebodings, has now left us forever. His long and eminent public service—service in the great metropolis as its conspicuous chief magistrate for three eventful terms, and service in this Hall as the representative of that metropolis, beginning almost two score years ago—is ended. His demise leaves a void which creates a hush and an awe to which this House is unaccustomed.

The committee of which he was chairman has been prompt to recognize its great loss and his remarkable character. His experience, his information, his presence, his courtesy, his dignity, and his courage marked him as a debater, a statesman, and a man of great qualities, attributes, and energies. Disease did not, for it could not, close—only death did or could close—his distinguished career.

He felt and knew when he left us, as he stated in his last speech on this floor, that he was nearing the closing hours of an eventful life. He met death dauntlessly.

As a mark of sorrow and sympathy, of esteem and respect to one of the foremost men in this House and in the country, the delegation of the State of New York will endeavor to have designated a day for such obsequies as will fitly commemorate the eminent character of the deceased.

I ask that the House may now take action on the resolutions submitted by my friend from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.]

The resolutions were adopted unanimously.

The SPEAKER. In obedience to the instructions of one of the resolutions just adopted, the Chair announces the appointment of the committee, whose names will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Select committee to attend the funeral of Hon. FERNANDO WOOD: Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia; Mr. FRYE, of Maine; Mr. PHELPS, of Connecticut; Mr. DUNNELL, of Minnesota; Mr. MILLS, of Texas; Mr. MCKINLEY, of Ohio; Mr. CARLISLE, of Kentucky; Mr. CHITTENDEN, of New York; and Mr. HUTCHINS, of New York.

The SPEAKER. In further obedience to one of the resolutions just adopted, the Chair now declares this House adjourned, in respect to the memory of the deceased, Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, till to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of First Lieutenant Robert G. Smithers, adjutant Tenth Cavalry, praying that the President be authorized to appoint him a captain in the Tenth Cavalry, to take rank as such from the 20th day of December, 1877; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; as follows:

Joint resolution for passage of House bill No. 3678.

Whereas there was a bill passed by Congress March 3, 1855, for the purpose of enabling the President of the United States to treat with and arrange the difficulties between the Stockbridge and Munsee Indians of Lake Winnebago, Wisconsin, arising out of the acts of Congress of March 3, 1843, and of August 6, 1846, and the treaty of November 24, 1848, in a just manner to the Indians, with their assent, and not inconsistant with the legal rights of white persons residing upon the Stockbridge reserve; and

Whereas a treaty was made and concluded at Stockbridge, in the State of Wisconsin, on the 5th day of February, 1856, between the United States and the Stockbridge and Munsee tribes of Indians, wherein the members of said tribes jointly ceded and relinquished their remaining title to the lands at Stockbridge, the seventy-two sections of land in Minnesota, the $20,000, the $16,500 invested in stock by the United States for said tribes, and all claims set up by and for said tribes; and

Whereas the United States agreed, in consideration of such cession and relinquishment by said tribes, to select and to give them a tract of land in the State of Wisconsin, near the southern boundary of the Menomonee reservation, of sufficient extent to provide for each head of a family and others lots of land of forty and eighty acres; and

Whereas the honorable senate and assembly of Wisconsin did, on the 31st day of March, 1856, pass a joint resolution that his excellency, the President, and the honorable, the Senate of the United States, be respectfully requested speedily to ratify and carry into effect the said arrangement; and

Whereas the said treaty was ratified on the 8th day of September, 1856, and the said tribes, in conformity therewith, removed to the reservation; and

Whereas the honorable the senate and assembly of Wisconsin did pass a joint resolution on the 16th day of September, 1856, that the assent of the State of Wisconsin is hereby given to the locating by the United States of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribes of Indians on a tract of land to be selected near the south line of the Menomonee reservation; and

Whereas an act entitled "An act for the relief of the Stockbridge and Munsee Indians of Wisconsin" was passed on the 6th day of February, 1871, which was construed so as to deprive a portion of the said tribes of their rights which were secured by the aforesaid treaties; and

Whereas there is now a bill before Congress, and has been pending for one year, for the purpose of restoring to the said portion of the Stockbridge and Munsees their rights to the tribal funds and to the said reservation, which they are deprived of by the said act of February 6, 1871: Therefore,

Resolved by the assembly, (the senate concurring.) That his excellency the President and the honorable the Senate of the United States be respectfully requested to speedily pass House bill No. 3678 for the relief of the Stockbridge and Munsee Indians in the State of Wisconsin.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair informs the Senator from Colorado that these petitions have all gone to the Committee on Finance. A large number were presented and so referred yesterday.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. I understood from the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] that the bill to which this refers was sent to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HEREFORD presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of West Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads, and read, as follows:

Joint resolution No. 9, requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to secure the passage of a law to regulate the traffic on interstate railways.

Whereas there is great and just complaint by the people of this State, and of the entire Union, because of the exorbitant charges by railways for the transportation of freights, because of unjust discriminations in those charges in favor of certain persons, companies, and corporations, and against certain other persons, companies, and corporations, and because of sudden and frequent changes in the rates of toll: Therefore,

Resolved by the Legislature of West Virginia, 1. That our Senators be instructed and Representatives in Congress be requested to secure the passage of a law which, while just to railways, will, as far as Congress has authority to legislate, relieve the people of the evils complained of and prevent abuses and devices that tend to burden interstate commerce and work to the injury of the public.

2. That the governor be requested to transmit to each of our Senators and Representatives a copy of this resolution.

He also presented the memorial of William H. Seese and others, citizens of Atlanta, Illinois; the memorial of John Fry and others, citizens of Springfield, Dakota Territory; the memorial of John Chandler and others, citizens of Flint, Indian Territory; the memorial of A. W. Blake and others, citizens of Saybrook, Illinois; the memorial of James Fraser and others, citizens of Benton, Illinois; the memorial of B. E. Miles and others, members of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Pennsylvania; and the memorial of J. F. Wagner and others, citizens of Ava, Illinois, all surviving soldiers of the war for the Union, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims, and the amendments thereto; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in favor of the repeal of war taxes on bank deposits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VEST presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Kansas City, Missouri, favoring the repeal of the law levying a special tax on banks and bankers, and also of the tax on bank checks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

SIDNEY P. LUTHER.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2165) for the relief of Sidney P. Luther, to report it without amendment. I desire to state that this case was before the Senate in the Forty-fifth Congress in the shape of a bill that had already passed the House of Representatives and was reported by the Committee on Finance favorably. It is a claim growing out of the wrongful seizure of a pair of steers, so admitted; and the amount of the bill is $85, which ought to have been refunded years ago. If there is no objection I will ask that the bill be acted on now in order that it may go to the House of Representatives in time for action there.

Mr. KERNAN. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. TELLER. I do not mean to object to this case, but there are a great number of cases on the Calendar which have been a long time on the Calendar and which have just as much claim on the Senate as this case has.

Mr. MORRILL. This has been twice reported favorably.

Mr. TELLER. I simply want to say that hereafter, after this morning, I shall object to any case being taken up specially unless there is some attempt made to go to the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish pending this question to ask unanimous consent that immediately after this bill is disposed of the Senate will do the unusual thing of passing a little bill for the relief of a poor widow, or not passing it, which had the misfortune to be reported on the 26th of January, and has been kept from being considered by bills reported from day to day and proceeded with by unanimous consent. I will make that request, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL?]

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 2165) for the relief of Sidney P. Luther. It provides for the payment to Sidney P. Luther, of Pittsburgh, New Hampshire, of $85, in full satisfaction of his claim on account of the wrongful seizure of one pair of white-faced steers, and the wrongful detention and sale of the same, by the collector of customs for the district of Portsmouth, on the 14th of October, 1870.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill called for by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] will now be read.

Mr. LOGAN. I object to taking up any more bills until the morning business is through.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am interested in the same bill that the Senator from Vermont is, and we make a joint request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois objects. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1971) for the relief of C. Hayner, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 141) authorizing the President to place Thomas C. Crittenden upon the retired list with the rank and pay of a brigadier-general, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 158) to admit free of duty a monument to General Washington, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 157) for the relief of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad, reported it without amendment.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2162) correcting the pension granted to Lieutenant George W. Graham, One hundred and forty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers, in accordance with his rank, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4413) for the relief of J. Scott Payne, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 249) for the relief of Mark Walker, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1364) for the relief of Edwin Mauck, of Crisfield, Maryland, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of Captain S. T. Norvell, Tenth Cavalry, praying pay as acting second lieutenant from January 28, 1862, to February 18, 1863, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Michael Pfoertner asking for the removal of the charge of desertion, and that he be granted an honorable discharge, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was orderded to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Captain Augustus Boyd, late assistant quartermaster United States Army, praying for the passage of a bill placing him on the retired list of the Army, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1378) for the relief of John W. Eckles, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Sprague's Mills, Maine, praying that Esther W. Sprague, postmistress, be credited with certain moneys belonging to the Government which were destroyed by fire, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McDONALD asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2181) for the relief of First Lieutenant Robert G. Smither, adjutant Tenth United States Cavalry; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2182) for the relief of Edward Haile, surviving partner of Savage & Haile; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the papers on the files relating to the case, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BECK asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2183) for the relief of George W. Wicks & Co., of Louisville, Kentucky; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2184) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to appoint additional policemen for temporary service in the District, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HARRIS. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to ask for the present consideration of that bill. The subject-matter has not been referred to the committee, but the committee has considered it and instructed me to ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read at length for information, and objections reserved.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to appoint, upon the recommendation of the superintendent of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, three hundred additional privates on the Metropolitan police force of said District, for the period of fifteen days, from the 20th of February, 1881, who shall be paid $2 for each day's service rendered by them in that capacity. And a sum sufficient for their payment and equipment is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President. I think that these additional policemen ought to be appointed under the authority of the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses and be under the control and in addition to the Capitol police, as it is evidently for the inauguration time, and therefore I want to have time to move an amendment to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made the bill goes over.

Mr. GROVER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2185) making an appropriation to repair the wagon-road between Camp Stewart and Fort Klamath, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2186) making an appropriation to repair the military wagon-road extending from Scottsburgh to Camp Stewart in Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MAXEY asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2187) for the relief of Thomas Little; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CALL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2188) for the relief of Thomas F. Riley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2189) to prohibit the manufacture, importation, and sale of intoxicating liquors, as a beverage, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. I introduce that bill by the request of the National Temperance Society. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 160) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States in relation to the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. INGALLS. I offer an amendment to the deficiency appropriation bill which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and I express the hope that they will report it back with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations favorably. I ask to have the amendment read.

The proposed amendment was read, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as follows:

That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to make the readjustments of salaries of postmasters provided for in section 8, act of June 12, 1866, which have not been made, to have the same effect as if made when the returns entitling such postmasters to such readjustments of salaries were received; and report the amounts due to Congress.

Mr. COKE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS, Mr. VEST, and Mr. BUTLER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

EQUALITY OF TAXATION.

Mr. McDONALD. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the people ought to contribute to the support of the Government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue they enjoy under its protection. In the observation or neglect of this maxim consists what is called the equality or inequality of taxation.

I desire to give notice to-morrow morning, with the leave of the Senate, to call up that resolution for the purpose of submitting a few remarks upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be printed.

EVENING SESSIONS FOR THE CALENDAR.

Mr. TELLER. I now call up the resolution I offered yesterday.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. TELLER on the 14th instant:

Resolved, That on and after Tuesday, the 15th instant, the Senate will take a recess at —— and meet again at half past seven p. m. of the same day, to consider the cases on the Calendar, and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question, and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

Mr. TELLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. TELLER. I only want to say that we have on the Calendar a great number of cases; and if we could come here and give them a couple of hours' consideration in the evening they would undoubtedly become laws, those that are not objected to. There are a great number of such bills that have come here from the House. If they are not passed, the whole labor must be done over again. The Committee on Claims have been in session during the whole winter, and have been presenting reports to the Senate that they have given a great deal of attention to, and nothing is to be done with them unless we come here in the evening. It is apparent we shall do nothing in the morning. I think we ought to do something.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the yeas and nays are ordered to be called on the adoption of the resolution, and I desire to call the attention of my friend from Colorado to the fact that he probably designed to fill the blank in his resolution before it is adopted. It is now Tuesday, and he perhaps would like to have it begin to-morrow or some later day.

Mr. TELLER. I am not particular whether it begin to-day or whether it begin to-morrow. If any Senator desires to amend it in that particular I have no objection, but I think we ought to begin pretty soon.

Mr. HOAR. But there is a blank in the resolution, if I heard it correctly.

Mr. TELLER. If we leave it a blank we take the recess when we get ready. The word "at" should be stricken out; so as to read "take a recess and meet again."

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move to amend the resolution by inserting "Monday, the 21st," instead of "Tuesday, the 15th."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will be noticed that this resolution, differing from what is called the Anthony rule or resolution, is a peremptory one. The Anthony rule provided that unless otherwise ordered this same thing should be done at a certain time, as far as I can understand it. This makes it peremptory, so that the Senate cannot otherwise order except on a day's notice of a repeal of this rule.

There are a great many appropriation bills still undisposed of. There is the cattle bill of great importance. Whatever we may think of its constitutional difficulties or methods, the subject is one of infinite importance that deserves consideration. There is the funding bill about the importance of which I need say nothing. There are a great many matters of extreme public importance which may require continuous sittings of the Senate from day to day until late in the evening and which might be entirely squeezed out every evening by this peremptory order which cannot be got rid of except by a repealing resolution, which if any one Senator objects goes over a day and then takes its chance of being discussed over the morning hour, and so on. So in the interest of all the business of the Senate—although I sympathize with the Senator from Colorado entirely as to the injustice that is done to the small matters on the Calendar—it seems to me it would not be wise to make a peremptory order of this kind.

Mr. TELLER. In order that no one may vote against this resolution for that reason, I will, with the consent of the Senate, amend by inserting "unless upon motion the Senate shall otherwise order."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to that modification.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Let the resolution be read as it now stands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Tuesday, the 15th instant, unless upon motion the Senate shall otherwise order, the Senate will take a recess and meet again at half past seven p. m. of the same day, to consider the cases on the Calendar; and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Clerk has not amended that as it should be:

On and after Tuesday, the 15th instant, the Senate will take a recess and meet again at half past seven p. m. on the same day, to consider the cases on the Calendar—

Then after the word Calendar—

unless otherwise ordered by the Senate.

I want the Senate to meet in the evening at all events.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is now on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will modify my amendment by naming "Wednesday, the 16th instant," instead of "Monday, the 21st." I think the Senator from Colorado will accept that.

Mr. TELLER. I will not object to that. It may not be convenient for the Senators generally to come to-night.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution, as modified, will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Wednesday, the 16th instant, the Senate will take a recess and meet again at half past seven p. m. of the same day, to consider the cases on the Calendar, unless upon motion the Senate shall otherwise order; and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

Mr. BECK. I hoped that the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island to make it next Monday and after would prevail, because I suppose that meeting at eleven o'clock, and sitting all day here, some of us might want a day or two to arrange so as to have all our nights free, which we have not now perhaps. I would rather have it begin next Monday than to-morrow, if it can be done.

Mr. BURNSIDE. That was my feeling in offering the amendment I first presented.

Mr. BECK. I will move to insert "Monday, the 21st."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky moves to amend by striking out "Wednesday, the 16th," and inserting "Monday, the 21st."

Mr. VOORHEES. I am perfectly willing that this resolution in some form may pass so as to accomplish the work of this session, but I wish to reserve an evening for the consideration of the Library bill. I had intended to ask the Senate by unanimous consent to consider it to-morrow evening. I do not want to obstruct legislation; I do not want to antagonize the appropriation bills; but I do not want to add one more to the long, dismal list of failures and expenditures of money in investigating this Library question. I wish the Senate to take cognizance of the fact that for eight years past this question has been before the Senate and money has been spent session after session, and if the commission of which I have the honor to be chairman is to fail of success in its arduous and conscientious labors, I intend to place the responsibility where it belongs. It does not belong to the committee.

In March, 1873, recognizing the necessity of additional accommodations for the Library of Congress, a joint commission of three members, the chairman of the Library Committee, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and the Librarian of Congress, were appointed to consider the question, with an appropriation of $5,000 to obtain plans.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair interrupts the Senator. The morning hour has expired. If this proceeding continues it must be by unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the morning hour has expired——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana has the floor, and will proceed, unless objection be made.

Mr. VOORHEES. I say that eight years ago, when this matter was first agitated, a joint commission of three members was appointed and an appropriation of $5,000 was made, which was expended for plans. Twenty-eight plans were reported, and the whole subject laid before Congress, and Congress saw fit to do nothing. Everybody recognized that a Library building had to be built. Five thousand dollars of the public money was spent, and then that commission was treated as it seems this commission is to be treated. Perhaps they did not make as determined an application to the judgment and conscience of the Senate as I intend to do.

Again in 1874 the Joint Committee on the Library agreed on a separate building, but could get no action from this body except another appropriation of $2,500 for the purpose of obtaining plans to illustrate the possibility or impossibility of building a library in connection with this Capitol. That money was wasted; it was all spent and nothing was done. The committee then did its duty as it has done now, and Congress then failed to do its duty as it seems it is determined to do now.

Again in February, 1875, the same committee reported in favor of a separate building to be erected on Judiciary Square, as has been reported now, and asking for an appropriation of $250,000. Congress, as usual, failed to take action on the subject; every member of Congress knowing that the Library was in a disgraceful condition, and every member then here and in the other House knowing that their wives and daughters could not go into the Library and find a seat in the midst of the piles of dust and books and boxes; every member of Congress knowing then, as we now know, that you cannot find a map there, cannot find a chart, or indeed anything else, except through the vigilant and untiring industry of Mr. Spofford, the Librarian, who furnishes us our books under the most distressing circumstances. Every member of Congress to-day knows that there are 100,000 valuable volumes without shelf-room, crushed by the weight of other books on the top of them, and still the subject it seems is to go by.

Again, sir, as if we were never done wrangling, as if like schoolboys we could not agree where to build a house for books, in June, 1876, this committee, baffled in every other direction, as an experiment, and as a compromise, reported in favor of erecting a building on the site of the Botanic Garden, which was an excellent locality for Noah's ark a few days ago. It was there discovered that by digging about forty feet through muck and mud you might find some solid ground for a foundation. We all know now that this site occasionally entertains a flood, and that the arts of navigation would be required to get to the Library at different periods and stages of the water in the Potomac. That scheme failed, perhaps floated down the river, and the money appropriated was lost and sunk.

But the subject did not die; it came up again in March, 1877. It seems strange to me that an intelligent body like the American Congress cannot agree on the subject of where and how to build a house to put books in. I have had illustrious predecessors in this business, and their labors have all died the death and come to naught; their works have perished by the wayside. If the labors of this present joint commission, created by act of Congress in May last, shall perish, I intend for my part that the fault shall lie at somebody else's door; not at the door of the commission.

In February, 1878, another joint commission was raised resulting in another act for another set of plans, with another appropriation of $2,500 of the people's money, followed at last by another report to build a separate building away from the Capitol on Judiciary Square. There it stopped again. This was in 1878 and there it stood. It did not budge another inch. We can legislate, it appears, on all other subjects except books. If it were not that I regard the Senate of the United States as the most august legislative body in the world, I would say that it had and deserved the contempt of the book men of the whole country. The librarians of the United States were here the other day and seeing the disorderly condition of our Library they addressed us on the subject through the resolution I had the honor to present a few days since. Why not address ourselves to this important matter at once? I see my excellent friend from Virginia rising to ask us to legislate on the pleuro-pneumonia of cattle, contagious diseases of swine, and subjects of that kind. We can and ought to do so; but when we encounter the question whether we shall provide decently and in order for the accommodation of the intellectual product of the world, there we stall and there we stick.

But further, in February, 1879, after abandoning the bottom at the foot of the hill, we instructed the Secretary of the Interior to enter into the business of appraising real estate in certain quarters of the town. We instructed him to appraise and fix a valuation for certain named squares; a most agreeable proceeding to the real-estate pools which surround this Capitol and want to sell their ground. This was done, and I suppose we got a flood of light on how many dollars a foot ground commands in this District. But that came to naught; and then, unfortunately perhaps, nearly two years ago I was honored with the position of chairman of the Library Committee. It brought me into immediate and business contact with that great monument of learning with its nearly four hundred thousand volumes, 300,000 now with more than 100,000 lying one on top of another, not shelf-room for much more than two-thirds. My official position brought me into business relations with this institution. I took cognizance of its condition; I found out my duty, and I have tried to do it. I succeeded at least in so far arresting the attention of Congress as to secure the law under which the present joint select committeee is acting.

The act was passed in May, 1880, and connected with that act was another appropriation of $5,000, and we have spent it. We have expended it for plans, for drawings, for designs, and for work in connection with the duties of the committee. We have done our duty faithfully. It was not thirty minutes after Congress adjourned sine die on the 16th day of last June until that commission was called together in this building, and we sat in our room all that afternoon, while everybody else was packing up and rushing out of town, and before we had separated we had appointed three architects, distinguished, able, conscientious men. We gave them their instructions, and upon our return here in December they laid before us a wealth of skill in architectural designs, and we at once took up the subject and proceeded with it until we have laid upon the table of this body and upon the table of the Speaker of the House of Representatives our report, covering every phase of the question, and our bill providing for the protection and preservation of the Library of Congress.

Now, is it too much to ask this body to consider this question? This subject had better be dropped now and for good, or else let us take it up and act upon it. For eight years not one year has passed that we have not had the subject under investigation and been extensively spending the public money in regard to it. Why, sir, during this time it will be seen there have been four special commissions on the Library building business, five or six joint committees, and nearly a dozen reports. Four separate and distinct appropriations, one of $2,000, one of $2,500, and two of $5,000 each, have been made and expended in drawing plans. Here are $14,500 already devoted by Congress to the futile task of finding out "how not to do it."

Are we to go on forever in this fruitless and wasteful method while our books are going to destruction under our very eyes? Can your Librarian continue to pile up a constantly increasing heap and produce the books in season for your wants from the bottom of the pile to the end of this century? We have been eight years in doing nothing, until now the country is made fully aware that the disgraceful condition of things in this Capitol calls for action at our hands. Such a point has the overcrowding of the Library arrived at that it is almost rendered useless as a place of resort for intelligence.

I have said now all that I desire to say at this time. To the very end of this session, however, I shall not relinquish the hope of action. I desire action. I am not asking to interpose as against any business this afternoon, but I will ask the Senate to set aside to-morrow night. One evening can dispose of this bill and either remand it to the tomb of the Capulets with its $5,000 of appropriation wasted in vain, or we can take a step forward toward the completion of this great and necessary work.

I do not feel willing to be made the instrument of wasting the public money and the time which belongs to the public in bringing forward here the results of our labors and have them ignored. I ask, and hope I may be indulged in the request, that to-morrow night may be set aside for the consideration of this question.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that a session be held to-morrow evening for the consideration of the Library bill.

Mr. TELLER. Before we proceed, in order that the Senate may have no trouble about it, I should like to amend my resolution by fixing its commencement at "Thursday, the 17th instant." That will give the Senator from Indiana to-morrow night without any objection, and I understand that several Senators have made engagements for to-morrow night and it would not be pleasant for them to come here. Therefore I move to amend by saying "Thursday, the 17th instant."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to that modification? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will be so modified.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, if the question can be put without debate on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, I have no objection; but if it is to be discussed further I shall have to object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection that a special session be held to-morrow evening for the special consideration of the Library bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I feel obliged to object, as I do always, to special orders at this stage of the session. I believe they are not useful even for the purpose in view.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. TELLER. I ask consent of the Senate to take a vote on this resolution. I think it will meet with the approbation of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there unanimous consent that the vote be now taken on the resolution under discussion?

Mr. WHYTE. I have no objection if I am allowed to offer an amendment without any remarks.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I should like to offer an amendment also.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to offer an amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over under objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to postpone the present and all prior orders in order to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 4592.

Mr. VOORHEES. What became of the resolution of the Senator from Colorado?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It went over on objection. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] moves that the pending order, being the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the Anthony rule, be postponed, so that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the funding bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON. As the cattle bill was taken up yesterday and partly considered, I had hoped that this morning, in the morning hour, of which there is an hour yet left, we might take up that bill and proceed with its consideration. We are about half way through with the amendments of the committee. I hope the Senate will consent to continue that bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope not. I insist on my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. INGALLS. What is that motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is that the pending order, being the consideration of the Calendar under the Anthony rule, be postponed, the Senator stating his purpose, if that shall prevail, to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the funding bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise to ask if the pending order shall be now postponed, which is understood to be the Anthony rule, what will be the condition of the bill of the Senator from Delaware at the expiration of the morning hour, at half past one o'clock?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He will have to renew his motion to continue it.

Mr. HARRIS. I think so, unquestionably.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall ask to continue its hearing at that time.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. What is the motion pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is that the pending order, which is the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the Anthony rule, be postponed, the Senator from Delaware stating that if that motion shall prevail, he will ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the funding bill.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to ask what position the cattle bill, as it is called, occupies now?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is on the Calendar as the unfinished business, and will naturally come up at half past one o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSTON. In order to test the sense of the Senate, inasmuch as the morning business has been laid aside, I will move to substitute the cattle bill for the bill proposed by the Senator from Delaware.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That motion is not in order.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The effect, then, of the motion of the Senator from Delaware will be to cause the cattle bill to lose its place?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That depends. If the motion of the Senator from Delaware now made shall prevail, the funding bill will be in order until half past one, when the unfinished business will come up.

Mr. PADDOCK. Is not the cattle bill the unfinished business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is. Then the Senate will determine its action. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the motion of the Senator from Delaware to postpone the pending order?

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. THEODORE F. KING, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 337) authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government and people of France an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the centennial anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown, Virginia.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1327) to grant lands to Dakota, Montana, Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming for university purposes.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6719) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, insisted upon by the Senate; that it insisted upon its amendment to the second amendment of the Senate to the said bill disagreed to by the Senate; that it agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HIESTER CLYMER of Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM H. FORNEY of Alabama, and Mr. JOSEPH R. HAWLEY of Connecticut, managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3047) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to recommend a proper site for a union railroad depot in the city of Washington, and for other purposes, and asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon and had appointed Mr. WARNER MILLER of New York, Mr. EPPA HUNTON of Virginia, and Mr. G. C. HAZELTON of Wisconsin, managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

A bill (H. R. No. 4005) to incorporate a society for the protection of children in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 6324) to construe an act entitled "An act to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia and to clear the title of the trustees of such property;"

A bill (H. R. No. 6659) to authorize the Southern Maryland Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 7031) to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 7032) to amend the act incorporating the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company;

A bill (H. R. No. 7033) making the city of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee, a port of delivery;

A bill (H. R. No. 7117) authorizing the Washington and Chesapeake Railroad Company to extend its railroad into and within the District of Columbia;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 378) providing for the printing and distribution of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1880; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 386) for printing report of the Life-Saving Service.

THE FUNDING BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware now moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the funding bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was, in line 15, section 1, after the word "bond," to strike out "in the" and to insert "to an;" so as to read "the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds to an amount."

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to submit to the Senate some remarks explanatory of the object of the committee. Before that is done, however, for the purpose of intelligibility, I will ask that some verbal errors be corrected. On page 2, on line 30 of section 1, the word "issued" has been improperly printed instead of "registered." That is a correction made by the direction of the committee. Also on page 5, at line 2 of section 5, the words "the said terms of one and" are superfluous and should be stricken out. Also on page 3, on line 40 of the first section the words "publication of" ought to be inserted between the words "after" and "notice."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Are these amendments offered for consideration?

Mr. ALLISON. They are mere verbal amendments.

Mr. BAYARD. And on page 6——

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to understand the meaning as we go on.

Mr. BAYARD. On page 6, line 11 of section 5, the last word "date" should be replaced by the word "publication." The amendments I have suggested place before the Senate the bill as it was intended to be reported from the Committee on Finance, and the amendments that I have stated are those which will render the bill intelligible to Senators who engage in the discussion.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. How are we to understand these amendments? I cannot for my life. How are we to understand the effect these amendments have on the bill? I cannot understand them by having them gone over in this way.

Mr. BAYARD. I propose now, with the leave of my honorable friend, to discuss the effect of these amendments. The errors I have proposed to remedy were simply clerical; they are misprints. These are not amendments in a parliamentary sense; they are corrections of misprints. It was suggested that the bill should be reprinted after these errors had been discovered but it was considered unnecessary because they could be corrected at this time and in the manner I have suggested.

Mr. President, in little more than sixty days from this date a loan of the United States, bearing 5 per cent. interest, and amounting to $469,651,050, will, at the option of the Government, become payable. On the 30th day of June next two other loans, each bearing 6 per cent., the first for $145,786,500, and the other $57,787,250, will also mature at the option of the Government. These facts are stated in the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and will be found on page 10 of his report of last December. He has informed us that the surplus revenue accruing prior to the 1st of July, 1881, will amount to about fifty million dollars, and can and will be applied in part to the extinguishment of that debt. Bonds maturing on the 31st of December last were paid out of the accruing revenues. So that there will remain the sum of $637,350,600, to be provided for and funded at the option of the Government at such rate of interest as may be deemed advisable by Congress and can practicably be obtained.

The sums that we are dealing with are enormous, affecting the welfare of every branch of our country's industry and of our entire people. The opportunity for reducing the rate of interest upon this enormous sum, and not only that, but of placing the national debt more under the control of the Government in regard to future payments, is now before us. The opportunity for doing this upon favorable terms should not be lost, and the only question before us as legislators is how we can best and most practically take advantage of the hour.

We all feel that this country is enjoying its years of plenty. Whether they are to be limited to seven such as blessed Egypt in the days of old or to be increased to seventy as we all hope, is a question that the veil of futurity excludes from our knowledge. We have had a succession of years of abundant harvests. Our mines were never so productive, not simply of precious metals, but minerals of every character have been brought into the use of mankind in this country to a degree unprecedented in history. There has also been a prosperous condition of all manufacturing industries, and enveloping the whole in its atmosphere is a buoyant sense of popular confidence and hope in our people at large. Material prosperity seems to have set in upon us in a most unmistakable current. The balance of trade has declared itself immensely and unprecedentedly in our favor, and the inflow of the precious metals has been marked by their payment in large part of that balance of exchange. The absolute and profound peace which reigns throughout our borders, and which affects our relations with foreign nations, has enabled us to keep in service the mere skeleton of a standing army, which does not now amount to one-twentieth of 1 per cent. of our population. The Navy has been so neglected that to-day it stands but the shadow of a once great name. Of an essential system of coastwise defense we scarcely have a trace. If there be impediments to aggressive warfare upon our coasts, it is those that nature has supplied, and not those which a wise and systematic preparation dictates should be inaugurated. But this neglect, if neglect it be, has been accompanied by economy in expenditure, and therefore we retain the moneys that these things might have cost within our control, and with our credit unaffected by expenditure which under other counsels might have been incurred.

Therefore we have for the present an immense advantage, coupled with a most important fact, that under existing laws the advantage continues—which I trust will become permanent—of transacting the whole of our great business upon a specie basis, and the effect and value of this can scarcely be overstated.

But there may be another side to this picture, and all these features that now so delight us may be sadly altered. The vicissitudes of nations, the ebb and flow of favoring circumstances, should always be contemplated, and preparation for adversity made during the seasons of prosperity. Business depressions, falling prices, enforced idleness of the laboring classes, all produce a condition of things far different; and there should be echoes in our ears of the labor troubles of 1877 to teach us to guard against the recurrence of such dangers in the future.

To-day we are continuing the coinage and issue of the two precious metals to the full limit of our minting capacity, at a ratio which is wholly in defiance of the relative commercial values of those two metals. We have on our statute-books to-day two declared units of value, one of which is worth, and has been worth for a long time past, without prospect of change, but seven-eighths of the value of the other; and that man must be blind who does not see the inevitable consequence. The time cannot be remote when the laws of nature and of universal values will vindicate themselves, and all of our business transactions, individual and public, and all the prices for commodities will be adjusted upon the basis of the metal which has been over-valued, and soon rather than late our country will be brought upon the sole standard of that over-valued metal, which is silver. This would place gold at a premium, and although enhancing prices here nominally it would not change those prices as measured by the world's standard and measure of values. It would be but the subsitution of an illusory for a real measure of values.

This inevitable result has a certain amount of disguise at the present under our statutes in the issue of silver certificates based upon coin deposited in the Treasury. This makes the approach of a silver standard more insidious and less palpable, but in reality it is hastened and encouraged. It is this condition of affairs that in my judgment renders it imperative upon those having charge of the legislation of the country to seize the opportune moment, which is to-day, and fund our national debt at the lowest practicable rate of interest and on the most favorable terms as to times of payment.

Two propositions have been made, one by the House of Representatives and one from the executive branch of the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury, at page 12 of his report, has recommended the refunding of $400,000,000 of the national debt at a rate not exceeding 3.65 per cent.

It is also recommended that authority be given to sell at par an amount not exceeding $400,000,000 of bonds of the character and description of the 4 per cent. bonds of the United States now outstanding, but bearing a rate of interest not exceeding 3.65 per cent. per annum, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after fifteen years, the proceeds to be applied to the payment of bonds redeemable on or before July 1, 1881.

The House of Representatives has proposed that we should fix the rate of interest at 3 per cent., and make the bonds payable in ten years, with the option to the Government to redeem them in five years. Upon careful deliberation and considering all the arguments from every respectable source that we could obtain, the committee of the Senate have modified both the proposition of the Secretary and the proposition of the House. We have reported to the Senate the issue of the $400,000,000 of bonds recommended by the Secretary and the House, but we have fixed the interest at 3½ per cent., being a shade lower than that proposed by the Secretary and a slight increase upon the rate proposed by the House, and we have fixed the time of payment at twenty years instead of ten, with the option of paying the debt at the end of five years. The term five-twenties would therefore continue to be applicable to this form of the national debt, and one as to which having had experience of a most favorable character and to which the people of the country have become accustomed, it was thought that feature alone gave it weight and increased the probability of its success.

There are various reasons for this. Opinions have differed and always will differ as to this matter. Intelligent and patriotic men believe that it is practicable to fund the whole of this debt at the rate of 3 per cent. Others again, equal to them in experience, ability, and opportunities of judgment, have told us there would be risk in the attempt. Speaking for myself and for the majority of the committee, we believe that the weight of authority is in favor of running no risk, and that the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum is that which under all the circumstances it is wiser and better for the United States to adopt in order to obtain freely the desired loans from the public.

Consider for a moment the experience of other nations in this regard. At the head of the commercial world is the Empire of Great Britain. Nowhere has government been more permanent or its institutions more stable, or the certainty of the repayment of loans and indebtedness secured by law more perfectly. The conditions, therefore, of low interest have been as perfect there as human institutions have ever been able to procure; and yet what is the result? When, in the last half century, the especial period of her progress and success, have the consols of Great Britain not paid more than 3 per cent. to the investor? Yet those bonds have a feature which is denied to our own, and for my own part I cannot regret it, and that is, the creation of a permanent debt. During the last fifty years the loans of Great Britain have touched par, I believe, but twice.

Mr. McPHERSON. Would it discommode the Senator if I should ask him a question? If so, I will wait.

Mr. BAYARD. If my friend will ask me the question a little later, I shall be pleased to answer it. I should rather not break the continuity of what I propose to say.

It may be stated in regard to the rate of interest returned upon the investment of English consols that it has varied between 4 and 3½ per cent. I am speaking now of the return upon the cost of the British consols to the investor. Sometimes it has paid more than 4, and sometimes even less than 3 per cent., but those have been the extremes of depression and exaltation of price. It may be said upon authority that the investor in British consols has during the last quarter of a century received on an average rather more than 3½ per cent. income.

At page 5 of a pamphlet containing the report of an interview between the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Treasury, and the Treasurer with the Committee on Finance, (with copies of which I think each Senator has been furnished,) will be found a statement taken from the London Economist of the 6th of November, 1880, to which I invite the attention of the Senate as corroborating the statement I have made. Tables following that, which show the market rate both of the present sale and original negotiation of their public loans by the Republic of France and the Empire of Germany, will also disclose the fact that in nations recognized as the commercial leaders of the world investment in their securities has paid the investor considerably more than 3½ per cent. I clipped from a New York paper of the 13th of February, 1881, the quotation of the French rentes, and they had declined from 84.3 to 84.20, and they are 3 per cent. securities. I also draw attention to the fact that there was a fluctuation in the price of the English consols from October, 1853, to the present time of more than 10 per cent., that they were as low as 90 in 1853, and as high as par in 1880; but more than that, to show the suddenness of fluctuation let me read:

In 1852 consols were quoted at prices varying from 3 below par to nearly 102; the history of matters for that year being as follows: Consols rose from 97 ex div. in January and touched 100 in May, and 101 early in June. They were then quoted ex div., but were again quoted at 101 ex div. on the 23d of June. Best bills were at that time taken in the open market at 1½ per cent. During August there was a relapse to 99½, but at the beginning of September consols were again above 100. They remained about that price until November, when they rose to 101½, and in December to 101¾. They were then quoted 100½ ex div., but closed for the year at 101 ex div. In 1853, from 101 they fell below 100 in the first fortnight in January, and reduced three percents, then at 101⅛, quickly followed. But in March they recovered to 100, and toward the end of April they rose to 101. Consols relapsed to 100 in June, and were then quoted 98½ ex div. They were as low as 90 in October, 1853, and have not since been at par until November, 1880.—London Economist, November 6, 1880.

I have drawn the attention of the Senate to the fact that the consols of Great Britain offered to investors permanence and absolute security, not simply ultimate security but that security which can be availed of at almost any day; and with these two elements so favorable to a low rate of interest they have not been able to maintain at par a loan at a rate of interest which it is proposed now to issue and maintain at par in this country. I shall ask the Senate to consider the difference of conditions in this country and Great Britain as affecting our bonded debt and to show that we cannot safely permit that fluctuation in prices which to their government under a system of permanent indebtedness is a matter of absolute indifference. There are conditions in this country which render it imperative to maintain our bonds at par or over par. The Secretary of the Treasury has spoken of the traditions of the country and its policy to maintain our bonds at par. That statement has the authority of the country's history, but there is something more practical and practicable than mere tradition and policy. There is an absolute necessity for us to see to it that as we have tied our systems of banking and currency to the fate of our national bonds they must stand or fall together. The currency of this country upon which the main part of its business is conducted, and to which it has been made essential, is based upon the national credit. That currency is obtainable only by the deposit of national bonds, 90 per cent. of currency being issued for 100 per cent. of bonds upon their face value, and the sense of security so absolutely found in the excess of value of the pledge, the responsibility of the shareholder, and the reserve established by law, have made this credit money of the Government national-bank notes receivable with absolute and unshaken confidence. Senators, that confidence existing almost solely upon credit, must not be disturbed. We have to-day what is called a resumption of specie payments, but to speak more accurately we should call it a redemption of notes that are at once reissued at the will of the debtor. How is that resumption assured? It cannot be said to be assured by the coin in the Treasury. We had at last accounts in gold coin and bullion $140,952,837, and of standard silver money $47,084,459; and that is to answer for $346,000,000 of demand notes and ultimately for the $350,000,000 of notes issued by the Government through the national banks. What, then, is to-day our security that resumption can be maintained? Not the coin in the Treasury, surely; but the existence of the power secured by the act of January 14, 1875, that gives to the Secretary of the Treasury the right to sell Government bonds bearing 4, 4½, or 5 per cent. interest, to any amount necessary to buy gold and pay the United States notes whenever presented at the Treasury. It is therefore this potentiality standing in impressive and powerful reserve that overshadows any attempt to make what is called "a run upon the Treasury" or endanger the permanence of resumption; and yet bear in mind those bonds, which under law are to be sold in order to supply the exigencies and meet the demand for gold, cannot be sold at less than par. Therefore I say that we should permit nothing to go upon the statute-book and take no step in the management of our finances that even tends to send our bonds below par, because the par value of those bonds is essential to the absolute maintenance and security of specie resumption. It is the power to sell those bonds under the act of 1875 that stands as the corps de reserve to enable the Government to pay specie for its notes on demand, and cause them thus to be an equivalent for specie. Under the free-banking system now in existence, the volume of our currency depends upon commercial demand and not upon political exigencies. Except for wise restriction as to the securities for loans and supervision as to reserve, the affairs of the banks styled "national banks" are managed and controlled by the rules only of enlightened self-interest. They loan to whom and as often and as much as the directors elected by the private stockholders see fit—no more and not otherwise—and the Government has no voice or control in their affairs except in the manner that I have referred to; that is to say, supervision of the securities for loans and as to the reserve. In other words, to restrain them from conversion into trust and loan companies instead of banks, and unfitting themselves for the true functions of banking.

I say then, if nothing else must be looked to, the duty of placing resumption of specie payment beyond doubt would be worth ten times the amount of the difference between 3 and 3½ per cent., and I hold that we have no right to run any risks on this point; and as I have said and believe, the weight of opinion is against our running such risks as we would do if we adopt the rate of 3 per cent. Why should we take a step in the dark when it may be taken so clearly in the light? Why should we create a ripple upon this placid stream of prosperity upon which the affairs of our country are now floating? There is neither wisdom nor economy in taking steps that tend to check in the minds of the American people confidence in their progress in prosperity. Let us only take such steps as we can to justify that confidence, and secure them against retrogression.

Let us solidify our credit and secure our bonds, and our credit moneys against depression and possible fluctuation. Wise, moderate and timely legislation can do this.

The rate of interest is, after all, controlled by the average rate of profit derived from the employment of capital. The profits of employing capital in industrious undertakings controls the rate of interest. A high rate of profit will always cause a high rate of interest. There is history for that. Where you have a low rate of profit the interest for the employment of money necessarily will be less. The Dutch were the leaders of the commercial world in the seventeenth and the greater part of the eighteenth century; but they had resorted to a system of overtaxation and burdened by taxation but little profit was left for the employment of money; and the result was that, as after all there is but a limited profit in production and that profit must be shared by labor and capital, the rate of interest fell to an extraordinarily low rate; but where taxes were lighter, the employment of money was more profitable, and the rate of interest increases in corresponding ratio with the profit on the use of capital.

Under certainty of law for securing the prompt repayment of loans, interest is low; for it is not the ultimate security, but it is the punctual and reliable payment of money expected that makes the rate of interest low. Money will be cheap where confidence is established. The more absolute the security the lower will be the rate of interest. I hold it that the demands for the employment of capital in legitimate enterprises all over the United States under this all-pervading sentiment of confidence that exists now, will make a Government loan at 3½ per cent. equitably low enough. Money in the United States securely invested will be worth on an average—I am speaking now of business investments—anywhere 5 per cent. and in some parts of this country from 6 to 7 per cent. and this last only in the newly settled districts. The United States is a younger country than Europe; it is more progressive; newer enterprises in the development of the natural wealth of this country necessarily exist here than in longer settled countries, and employment of capital will find "fresh fields and pastures new," and the profits of industry are greater in the United States than elsewhere. The superiority in profitable employment of capital, therefore, in this country justifies a rather higher rate of interest than it would in Europe.

Another fact should not be forgotten. We propose not to be borrowers in Europe, but we propose that these loans should be taken by our own people, and to find our market at home. I do not say our Government loans will not be open to purchase and be sought for by the residents of other countries; but I do mean to say that there is a general policy influencing the mind of the people of this country to-day that the loans of the Government of the United States should be owned by the citizens of the United States. For that reason, believing it to be wholesome and safe, believing it to be a bond of unity and security among our own people that these debts of the United States should be held by our own citizens and all over the Union, I would not wish to place them under too severe a stress by denying to them such a rate of interest as would be a fair and reasonable compensation for the use of the money invested.

I have said that our system of banking requires that these bonds should be held here, and our currency connected with banking makes it necessary that a large portion of the bonds should be here, because the deposit of the bonds is a condition-precedent to the issuance of the currency; therefore it is a matter of public policy that you have established, a policy coupled with and yet surpassing the institution of mere statute law, that the market for these bonds should be chiefly if not wholly found in the United States. And this consideration should have great weight in determining the rate of interest to be paid.

Mr. President, I should hold it greatly to be regretted that we should make the experiment of funding this loan at 3 per cent. and fail. We are not without experience on this subject. Our people seem to me to become so flushed and exhilarated by accidental and temporary success as to lose sight of and forget the facts of their own late history. We issued in 1870, under the funding bill, 5 per cent. bonds, and it was five years before the proposed loan could be floated, and then only by serious concessions of interest, which reduced our actual receipts below par. If as I believe the present hour is most opportune and the reasons which I have given for availing ourselves of it are sound, we have not five years to wait and dally with this subject; but it is plainly our duty to avail ourselves instantly of the opportunity now before us, and to do what the Secretary of the Treasury says he believes can be done successfully—refund the whole of the $637,000,000 outstanding bonds within the next twelve months. Every month's delay will cost our people $1,000,000 of excessive interest, and when we would seek to stop that serious loss we may find ourselves unable to do it.

We are sometimes told, "Look at the present advanced value of the 4 per cent. bonds; take them as your standard; they are now worth 113 in the market; if a 4 per cent. bond is worth that, surely a 3 per cent. is worth par," &c. Why, as a matter of fact, has not this agitation of the issuing a 3 per cent. loan been diligently and clamorously used for the last year—I do not say improperly, but vigorously used—as a species of menace to enhance the price of the four percents? If there should be a compulsory power exercised by this Government, which I deprecate, toward the stockholders of the national banks to force this loan upon them as the single and arbitrary condition of their continuing in business or going into ruinous liquidation; if that power does exist, necessarily men will value that which pays them one-fourth more interest, and the price of the bond that secures it will be necessarily advanced. Therefore I am compelled to consider the present price one of those fluctuating advances, temporary in its nature and caused by the abnormal and unsettled condition of things, that has given the 4 per cent. bond the advance from par, at which it was sold, to the great premium which it now enjoys. I do not think it is either sound judgment or reasonable common sense to take the present advanced price of the 4 per cent. bonds as a basis for calculation for the sale and maintenance of the price of 3 per cent. bonds.

I would here note that section 5 of the House bill contains what I have spoken of as the compulsory power of the Government proposed to compel subscription to its loans. In section 5 of the House bill, which has been stricken out by the Senate committee, it will be found that the bonds bearing 3 per cent. were to be "the only" bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation, compelling the banks to exchange any bonds bearing a higher rate of interest for those bearing the lower rate. That was intended to create an involuntary market for some two hundred and sixty-nine million dollars of these bonds. I did object, and do now to this, and the committee have reported against this compulsory feature, and I think they were wise and right in doing so. The exhibition of compulsory power, arbitrary power by a government over matters touching its credit, has never proved of ultimate and permanent value. It has rather suggested distrust, and lack of confidence in its own credit, that you should pass from our voluntary and free system of government to the involuntary and tyrannical; and there is in this compulsory action proposed toward the stockholders of the banks created by act of Congress an interference with their rights of private contract and the spirit, if not the letter of their chartered rights, which is discriminating and in my opinion unjust, unwise, and inexpedient. The real strength of this Government lies at last in the hearts of the people of the country, it cannot be created and established by compulsory statutes; and we must and we ought to leave every class of our citizens, rich and poor in this land, free to deal with their Government on equal and general terms applied without discrimination to all alike. The bonds under the present act as proposed by the Senate Committee on Finance will be receivable as security for circulation and will be used as its basis as heretofore provided by law in relation to other interest-bearing bonds of the Government.

I submit to the Senate that it is contrary and derogatory to the spirit of the American Government, which is a popular government professing to be based on the capacity of the people to govern themselves wisely, that the principle of compulsion for the reception of the loans of the Government should be forced upon any class of our people or for any purpose. You tried it with your legal-tender Treasury notes and declared that they should be receivable in payment of all debts public and private. There are laws stronger than the laws of Congress. You may possibly drive men out of a business, but they will conduct it as long as they remain in it by the light of self-interest, and compulsion will ever prove futile. Its attempt is a proof of conscious weakness, and its failure will be inevitable and speedy.

But it will be observed that in section 1 there is a provision for $300,000,000 of Treasury notes, and I will here remark, by way of explanation, that the reason why the word "certificate" has been stricken out of the House bill and the term "Treasury notes" interpolated is that the nomenclature of the proposed security may be retained according to existing law. It is a mere matter of phraseology. "Treasury note" is the proper phrase to be used instead of "certificate." We agree with the House that these Treasury notes should be a short loan applicable to obvious uses for which long loans are not desirable. They are analogous in their uses to what are termed exchequer bills in the English system. They are payable in ten years or at the option of the Government at any time after one year.

A large class of the heavy business operations conducted in this country, where capital is amassing itself in such enormous amounts, requires at times a pause, a non-use, preparatory to the execution of some extended enterprise. During those periods, to keep money from being stagnant, idle, and useless to its possessor, a very low rate of interest will be accepted upon the consideration that speedy and punctual payment awaits the creditor. You have, therefore, the apparent paradox that a bond with a short date of payment will sell at a lower rate of interest, although at the same time a bond with a prolonged date of payment will also sell for a lower rate of interest than a bond intermediate in date of payment to either. The practical fact is that with the short loan, transactions are contemplated which require punctuality and speedy payment, while for long investments undisturbed and permanent use of money is desired.

It is believed that by the discretion given to the Secretary of the Treasury under this bill he may sell these short Treasury loans, payable in one or ten years, at a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent. interest, that he will be enabled to dispose of the whole of them, or of a great part of them, at 3 per cent., and it may be at less than 3 per cent. The opportunity is thus given to save even more interest than was proposed by the House. It may be that the accumulation of capital awaiting investment and seeking temporary employment may enable the Secretary of the Treasury to sell these 1-10 bonds, or Treasury notes, as they are termed by the bill, at less than 3½, less possibly than 3 per cent. If so, it will be done. The fact may reasonably be relied upon that the best will be done under the power to sell at "not exceeding" 3½ per cent. that the circumstances of the hour will permit.

In section 4 is another feature to which I wish to call attention:

> That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, if in his opinion it shall become necessary, to use temporarily not exceeding $50,000,000 of the standard gold and silver coin in the Treasury in the redemption of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds of the United States authorized to be refunded by the provisions of this act.

And as a matter of precaution to avoid disturbance of the security to the resumption fund, the Senate Committee on Finance have interposed this amendment:

> Which shall from time to time be repaid and replaced out of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act.

The obvious meaning of that section would be, that it enables the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, to assist the process of refunding by purchasing himself, by paying from this fund in the Treasury these maturing bonds, and, from time to time, thus assisting the market. The amendment of the committee simply requires that it shall be but "temporarily" done, and that the resumption fund, the gold and silver held by him, shall not be permanently reduced, but that having been used for the purpose of calling in and paying off the outstanding bonds at the high rate of interest, that money shall be returned to the Treasury from the proceeds of these sales at par of the bonds authorized by the bill, and in the same description of coin.

Therefore it is apparent that should the money market of the world continue as favorable as we hope it will, and the placing of the debt be as smoothly and fortunately conducted as we hope it will be, and the rate of interest should be practically as low as 3 per cent., the Secretary of the Treasury, under the law relating to these short-date securities, will be enabled to avail himself of them to the fullest possible advantage.

I have spoken of the equivalency in value of a very long and a very short bond, and have given the reasons for it, which I will not now repeat. Each bond is specially favored for the purposes of the borrower or investor, the objects of borrowers or investors being wholly variant, some desiring the return of their money punctually and at a short date, and others desiring nothing but permanent investment and ultimate security.

The bonds we have provided shall be issued in multiples of $50, the Treasury notes in multiples of $10, but to avoid the detail and expense of the registration of such minute amounts as $10 the committee have limited the registration of the Treasury notes to sums not less than $100.

We have differed in judgment with the House as to the amount to be allowed for the expense of this refunding transaction. In the third section the Secretary of the Treasury is—

> Authorized and directed to make suitable rules and regulations to carry this act into effect, and the expense of preparing, issuing, advertising, and disposing of the bonds and Treasury notes authorized to be issued shall not exceed one-half of 1 per cent.

The House considered that it could be done for one-quarter of 1 per cent. I do not know all the reasons that could have induced that judgment; but it is plain that the one-half of 1 per cent. is not prescribed to be paid, but it shall "not exceed" the one-half of 1 per cent. Now, there have been few transactions in his management of the finances of the country that have redounded so much to the credit of the present Secretary of the Treasury as his adroit and economical refunding of debt during his administration. He has had from all sides that kind of recognition of public service that was honorable to him and entirely just.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PENDLETON in the chair.) The morning hour has expired and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the pending order be laid aside informally in order that we may continue the discussion of the funding bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not propose to interfere with the speech of the Senator from Delaware; but I desire that the regular order, which is the unfinished business, the cattle bill, be laid before the Senate and then it can be laid aside informally and the Senator can go on.

Mr. BAYARD. I cannot agree to the displacement of the business now before the Senate and therefore I move that the pending order being now the cattle pleuro-pneumonia bill be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that there be unanimous consent for the Senator from Delaware to finish his remarks; and then the question of the order of business, which will require a vote, can be settled. The Senator does not care about being interrupted by a call of the yeas and nays at this moment probably.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If that be the unanimous consent of the Senate, the Senator from Delaware will proceed.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it is shown that the expenses of the late refunding operations amounted to about three-eighths of 1 per cent., and the tables of similar expenses both in our own history and in the history of other governments show that such an operation was never before conducted at anything like so low a rate. I do not mean to say that there has been nothing gained by experience, or that we should continue expensive and ancient methods, or that we should test the reasonableness of this expense wholly by the past; but I do mean to say that upon examination no candid American will complain of extravagance in the late accomplishment of refunding. I do not mean to say that the same rate of three-eighths of 1 per cent. may not fully cover the entire expense of carrying this act into effect; but I do say that for the matter of one-eighth of 1 per cent. we ought not to tie the hands of our agents when we compel them to make due return to us of every dollar expended, and it would be both an unwise suspicion and an injurious act which would tend to jeopardize in any degree a transaction so vast and important as this under the possibility of restricting the cost by withholding one-eighth of 1 per cent.

I have not been able, had I been willing but I would not have been willing, to consider this great question by the narrow light of party. I would not be willing to make cheap reputation out of mere party prejudices in dealing with a question like this, or to gain unthinking applause by suggestions of recklessness, extravagance, or something that is worse than either upon the part of high officials charged with a great and important duty to be exercised in the light of public examination with returns for every farthing expended under their responsibility. For that reason, while desiring every just economy, while not affecting to deal with easy liberality as to moneys I am not to pay myself and being generous with the means of others, I still am not willing in contemplating the results as are necessarily embraced in these immense and important operations to the people of this country of so dealing with a gigantic debt—I am not willing to treat those who are to be the practical and responsible agents in the adjustment of this matter with undue or unworthy suspicion or I may add to bind them down with undue and improper restrictions. There is a proportion to be observed in all things; and we are not bargainers with mere brokers when we place a moderate discretion as to the expense of this great business in the hands of high officials who are presumably men of self-respect and character.

If in the future practical conduct of this business there should be a check in the smooth and successful operations of this refunding project because of the withholding of some small eighth of 1 per cent. which being paid would secure success and being withheld would frustrate it, I mean to say that responsibility shall not rest with me nor do I envy the man who shall hereafter feel that it rested with him. For that reason, as faithful counselors and trustees of the interests of the American people whom we represent, we may fairly say to the Secretary of the Treasury if you shall be able to effect this great operation, reducing the rate of our interest and confirming our Government credit at a cost not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent. to that limit you may go, within that limit stand as far as you can, and go before the people of this country as a faithful administrator mindful of the needs and interests of those whom you represent, and take whatever of shame or glory shall come to you from your performance of that duty.

There is another feature proposed by the Senate committee which I trust will meet the approval of the Senate. We have, as I say, stricken out section 5 as it came from the House, and we have substituted a new section, numbered 6 in the bill as reported and now before the Senate. In that section we have provided:

That the bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be receivable as security for the circulation issued to the national banks; and hereafter only bonds and other interest-bearing securities of the United States shall be receivable as security under section 5153 of the Revised Statutes.

Section 5153 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

All national banking associations, designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be depositaries of public money, except receipts from customs, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary; and they may also be employed as financial agents of the Government; and they shall perform all such reasonable duties, as depositaries of public moneys and financial agents of the Government, as may be required of them. The Secretary of the Treasury shall require the associations thus designated to give satisfactory security, by the deposit of United States bonds and otherwise, for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with them, and for the faithful performance of their duties as financial agents of the Government.

Under the authority given by the word "otherwise," it seems to have been the habit to receive mortgages upon the real estate of the institutions and other securities in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. The committee thought that it was a good time to put an end to that practice and to compel all these depositaries of the public money to deliver as collateral security interest-bearing bonds and other securities of the United States only; so that where moneys of the United States shall be temporarily deposited with these banks, the collateral security which must accompany such deposit shall consist hereafter only of the interest-bearing securities of the United States.

I believe, Mr. President, I have said all that now occurs to me as being fitly explanatory of the measure which has been brought into the Senate. There may be other features to which my attention may be drawn, and as far as my ability permits I shall be glad to explain them and give the reasons for my approval of the measure, or leave it to my associates upon the committee to make such other and abler explanation of the object we have in view as to them may seem proper.

I cannot close without beseeching the Senate not to lose the present opportunity for refunding the bonds now redeemable and placing the national debt upon a still firmer and more reputable basis, and reasonably within the control of our Government. I believe the time in which we live is exceptionally favorable to this. We have seen grave disaster, but our people to-day seem as if they believed it never could be seen again. There was a large grain of wisdom in the remark of the satirist that nothing is certain except the unexpected, and now in the flush of hopeful confidence let us provide against the dangerous surprises which the future may have in store for us.

Should there be error in this proposed rate of interest, should the estimate of the value of money be too high as reported, we have by this bill the option at the end of five years to remedy it, and for nearly one-half the amount to remedy it within twelve months. The option of the repayment of the $300,000,000 Treasury notes bearing interest and payable in one year or ten belongs to the Government, and of the $400,000,000 bonds at the end of five years, so that should the present current of prosperity continue we can avail ourselves of it as time shall show it is practicable for us to do so. We can do so without risk, because the present plan is filled with opportunity for so availing ourselves. Five years is a short time; it gives the time to test the wisdom and expediency of the proposed rate, and then comes the opportunity, if we see fit to avail ourselves of it, to fund at still lower rates if we find it is then practicable: but the present hour has its present duty, and I cannot help feeling that this Congress will be derelict in that duty to the American people if the bonds now under our control are not funded at the lower rate proposed by the measure reported to the Senate.

Mr. President, I realize the value and importance of refunding our loans and thus reducing the annual burdens upon our people, but I would be false to my own clear convictions if I did not now and at all times reaffirm my belief that it is even more important for us to settle our currency upon the bed-rock of stable and intrinsic value than even to reduce the rate of interest we pay yearly upon our loans. The currency of a country is the life-blood of the country. The currency of a country enters into and measures every transaction, great and small, public as well as private. The violation of the obligation of contracts, whether it is accomplished under the form of a legal-tender act or in any other way, is dishonest in its principle and is filled with danger so long as such a power is conceded to any government, State or Federal. I long to see the true measure of value permanently in use in this country, so that the honest man may be enabled faithfully to fulfill his contracts and the knave be prevented from evading them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, before the funding bill is displaced by the unfinished business which is now the regular order, I should like just now to ask the Senator from Delaware the question he declined to answer during the delivery of his speech.

Mr. BAYARD. I forgot it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware is still on the floor.

Mr. McPHERSON. I noticed the Senator omitted to state one thing when he was speaking of English consols and comparing them with a 3 per cent. American bond. He made the statement that they were a perpetual bond, I believe, or something to that effect.

Mr. BAYARD. I said they were a permanent security.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator did not observe at the time that there was a difference with respect to taxation between the English consols and the American bond. Would that have any effect whatever upon the market value of either bond? In other words, if there was a power in the British Government, as there is, by reason of another contract with the purchaser or holder of the bond that there shall be a rate of taxation, little or much, and if the necessities of the British Government were such as to require them to tax the bonds to a great extent, would it make any difference whatever in the respective value of the bonds?

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is right in stating that the English Government have always reserved the right to impose an income tax upon the interest of their consolidated loans, and I believe as a matter of fact there is to-day a tax of sixpence in the pound upon those incomes, the rate of which can be easily calculated. The tax is not upon the bond, it is upon the income which results. The tax is not made per se upon the bond, but there is a tax upon all English incomes which may be derived from bonds, provided, (and that is a very large provision,) an income tax can ever be collected. No fairer tax in theory, no more delusive tax in fact, can exist than an income tax. The experience of our own attempt to carry that on is fresh in the mind of everybody, and we know how much dishonesty appeared in that income tax. But the Senator is right: the income of a British subject which is derived from interest upon the consolidated loans of that country is the subject of taxation. That is the fact. Very little of the English loan is held outside of that country. The amount held, for instance, in the United States, I take to be exceedingly small; but how practically an income could be collected is a very different thing. For all that, the Senator is right in saying there is that difference between the bonds of the United States and the bonds of Great Britain. In Great Britain income derived from the bonds is not exempt from taxation, and in the United States, under existing law, it is; and therefore there is that reason why the English bonds should be less valuable than the United States bonds.

I would say further to my friend, I do not know that I have the tables that would render the computation precise and definite, but I believe that a bond in this country having fifty years or sixty years to run, or a longer time, approximating permanence according to the English theory, and without tax or the possibility of tax, at a lower rate of interest than 3 per cent. could be sold, but that is not the policy or the intent of the American people. We do not intend that this debt shall be permanent, and great sacrifices will be made to pay it off and leave us free so that increased taxation shall not be made necessary. That is the great question. I agree you cannot draw a satisfactory parallel on all fours between the loans of the British Government and the loans of the United States because these features undoubtedly do make a difference between them, yet there is an average rate and return for money which may be estimated, and information in regard to which may be given by comparing the current market rates of the securities of the two governments.

Mr. McPHERSON. I confess that I was somewhat surprised to hear the statement of the honorable Senator that the Secretary of the Treasury had recommended that the Government should issue a 3.65 per cent. bond; I was also very much surprised when I read the report of the Finance Committee of the Senate, recommending the Government to issue a 3½ per cent. bond, when we are confronted every day in the week by every-day financial transactions where the 4 per cent. bonds of this Government are selling at a price which yields scarcely 3 per cent. to the purchaser.

With respect to the comparison that the Senator has made, comparing the value of an American security, which has a market in almost every financial center of the world, with the English bond, which is subject to any scheme or rule of taxation which the government may itself adopt, when it is well known also that the English Government is in trouble with her own colonies, in trouble in India, and in trouble in Ireland, we do not know what English bonds may be worth in the future. Comparing the securities of the British Government, which have no date fixed for their payment, with the bonds of the United States, a Government which has shown itself able since the war to pay one-half of the national debt, and whose people have passed through trials and sacrifices such as no people and no government upon the face of the earth has ever gone through to establish credit; for that committee to come to the Senate and recommend that the Government issue a bond, and take by taxation upon the industries of the people a half per cent. more than the market to-day would warrant, is to me very surprising.

I wish to submit some remarks on this bill at the proper time. If the Senator from Virginia wishes to go on with the pleuro-pneumonia bill, of course I cannot submit them at present.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I only desired that the cattle-diseases bill shall not be displaced as the unfinished business. I am perfectly content that the Senator from New Jersey shall proceed with his remarks. Let the pleuro-pneumonia bill be considered as laid aside informally and then let the Senator from New Jersey proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 2097) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and for the suppression and prevention of contagious diseases among domestic animals, is laid aside informally without being displaced.

Mr. HOAR. What is the unanimous consent asked?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent is asked to lay aside the unfinished business without losing its place, in order that the Senator from New Jersey may continue his discussion of the pending funding bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Do I understand that the funding bill has in any way been displaced from the consideration of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The funding bill was displaced when the Senator from New Jersey lost the floor. He gave up the floor and the pending business is the contagious-diseases bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I had no intention that the funding bill should lose its place. It is in the control of the Senate to push that measure aside to take up any measure that it pleases; but I sincerely trust that it will not do so. If there be any gentleman who desires to address the Senate on this subject and for his convenience a delay in the discussion should be desired, I have not a word to say; but I do not propose, having brought the bill in here, to have it displaced until it is finally disposed of by the Senate. Therefore if the measure before the Senate be the pleuro-pneumonia bill represented by the Senator from Virginia, I shall move to lay it on the table in order to allow the Senator from New Jersey to continue the discussion of the funding bill, for which he is prepared.

Mr. JOHNSTON. There need be no misunderstanding about this matter. Yesterday, owing to the course that business took, the pleuro-pneumonia bill became the unfinished business, and by a sort of informal understanding between myself and the Senator from Delaware his bill was to take precedence before the Senate. I do not propose to interfere in the least with the Senator; but inasmuch as the pleuro-pneumonia bill is now the unfinished business I wish it to be laid aside informally and let the Senator from Delaware, the Senator from New Jersey, and anybody else who chooses go on and consider the funding bill, so that when the funding bill is through the pleuro-pneumonia bill may then be the unfinished business and be proceeded with.

Mr. BAYARD. With the understanding that there is to be no antagonism I withdraw the motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not propose to make any antagonism at all; but I do not want the pleuro-pneumonia bill displaced. The funding bill may proceed, laying aside the other bill informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The suggestion of the Senator from Virginia is that the unfinished business be laid aside informally in order that the consideration of the funding bill may be proceeded with.

Mr. HOAR. How did the contagious-diseases bill become the unfinished business?

Mr. PADDOCK. It came over as the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HOAR. Last night the Senator from Delaware moved that the funding bill be taken up. The motion was agreed to. Then the Senator from Virginia asked unanimous consent that the funding bill be informally laid aside temporarily; and this is the consent that was given, as stated by the Chair:

The Senator from Virginia asks that this bill be laid aside temporarily by unanimous consent, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to which he has referred.

That temporary consent, as I understand it, never goes beyond the day when it is made, and having been so made the other bill became the unfinished business under the motion of the Senator from Delaware, which was adopted by the Senate. If the Chair will consult page 53 of to-day's RECORD, the middle of the first column, he will perceive what the proceeding was.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I understand the case stands in this way: The pleuro-pneumonia bill is the unfinished business, but I do not propose to interfere with the consideration of the funding bill should that go on; but when the funding bill is through then we are to go on with the pleuro-pneumonia bill.

Mr. BAYARD. The question I think was stated by the Chair distinctly and clearly and under that I understand the funding bill to be before the Senate and the Senator from New Jersey entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts insist upon the question of order being made?

Mr. HOAR. I desire to have the matter settled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The RECORD shows that the last bill under consideration yesterday was the pleuro-pneumonia bill. The funding bill was not called up and laid before the Senate prior to the adjournment as it should have been in order to make it the unfinished business. The Chair, therefore, decides that the pleuro-pneumonia bill is the unfinished business. If the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia is agreed to by the Senate, the Senator from New Jersey may proceed with his remarks.

Mr. BAYARD. And the funding bill is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The funding bill is before the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. Do I understand that that leaves the pleuro-pneumonia bill in a situation to be called up at any time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, it leaves the pleuro-pneumonia bill as the unfinished business after the consideration of the funding bill shall have been concluded. The bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate more than ten or fifteen minutes, because I believe the whole question can be stated in that time.

The object of the proposed legislation is to complete the refunding of the national debt. Two hundred and two millions of 6 per cent. bonds issued at the beginning of the war are about to mature, and four hundred and sixty millions of five percents issued under the refunding act will become redeemable on the 1st of May next.

The duty of Congress, to my mind, is very plain, and may be stated in half a dozen sentences.

First, the bond to be issued should bear the lowest possible rate of interest under which, considering also the period of time fixed for its payment, the Government would receive its par value in exchange for it.

A 3 per cent. interest-bearing bond, having forty years to run, with such earlier option on the part of the Government, not less than ten years from the date of issue, to pay it, would in my opinion meet this requirement, and in a short time command a premium.

In proof of this we need only point you to the 4 per cent. bonds, which were taken as a speculation by a syndicate for a large commission less than the par value, and are to-day sold in open market at such a premium as scarcely makes them a more profitable investment than a 3 per cent. bond at par.

Does it not also prove that should Congress authorize a funding loan bearing 3½ per cent. the bonds so authorized would, after passing into the hands of a syndicate, advance in the market to a price at which they would not yield over 3 per cent. on the investment, and that it would thus be demonstrated that the Government might have saved the one-half per cent. per annum which investors and speculators had gained.

Were it not for the lingering hope that the predictions so freely made, which I regret to say have not been dissipated by the Finance Committee of the Senate, that a 3½ per cent. bond would be offered at par, no doubt would now be expressed in respect of the market value of a 3 per cent. bond.

With the whole bonded debt under the conditions now existing, selling so nearly on a 3 per cent. basis, no other arguments beyond this simple fact seem to be required to sustain the belief that a 3 per cent. bond of the United States can be negotiated at par.

Confronted by this fact the Finance Committee of the Senate report in favor of a 3½ per cent. bond and virtually ask the Senate to join it in a bear crusade upon the national credit. I read from the report:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds to an amount not exceeding $400,000,000, of denominations of $50, or some multiple of that sum, which shall bear interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum payable semi-annually, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years, and payable twenty years from the date of issue, and also Treasury notes to an amount not exceeding $300,000,000, in denominations of $10 or some multiple of that sum not exceeding $1,000, either registered or coupon, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after one year and payable in ten years from the date of issue; and no Treasury note of a less denomination than $100 shall be registered.

This report, taken in conjunction with the facts heretofore stated, seems most extraordinary. The four hundred millions of bonds are to bear 3½ per cent. interest, although confronted by the fact, supported by every-day transactions, that said bonds could and would be negotiated on much better terms. It is not often the holder of a note thinks better of it than the maker, and this has become so universal in practice a reversal of the principle was never deemed possible. It seems, however, that axioms in financial practice, even universal principles which a credulous people believed admitted of no change whatever, may be switched off out of the way at the will and pleasure of a congressional committee. Outside of those immediately and directly interested in speculation in bonds—and the number of these is small when compared with the host of actual investors—there cannot be found any considerable number of financiers who believe a 3 per cent. forty-year bond cannot be negotiated at par.

These bond speculators, with untiring and unflagging zeal, aided by a subsidized press, seek to influence Congress by appeals to the fears of its members that an unsuccessful attempt to negotiate a 3 per cent. bond would wound our credit and practically defeat resumption. How, they do not tell us. Pending action by Congress upon this bill these same speculators have even attempted to depress the market by a free sale of 4 per cent. bonds as information which would naturally influence Congress in favor of a higher and against a lower rate of interest; but as the bonds have advanced 2 or 3 per per cent., even under these assaults, it furnishes additional proof that to adopt the recommendation of the committee and issue a bond bearing 3½ per cent. interest would be a national folly.

The committee further recommend an issue of three hundred millions of Treasury notes, bearing interest at a rate not to exceed 3½ per cent. per annum, redeemable at the option of the Government after one year, and payable in ten years from the date of issue.

It will be remembered the bonds are to bear interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum, arbitrarily fixed. Said bonds have twenty years to run, with the reserved option to pay them after five years, while the rate of interest borne by the Treasury note shall not exceed 3½ per cent., implying that it might be possible to negotiate the notes at a lower rate of interest, notwithstanding the Treasury notes have only ten years to run, with the option to pay them after one year.

Here, again, the committee set at defiance all laws which have ever governed commerce in finance, by assuming that a short bond, yielding to the purchaser at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury at or under the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum, could be negotiated at par, while the long-term, and therefore better, bond, bearing a fixed rate of 3½ per cent. per annum, and no less, would not command more than the par value.

Mr. BAYARD. Would it interfere with the Senator if I should make an inquiry?

Mr. McPHERSON. Not at all.

Mr. BAYARD. Would the Senator desire to be understood as saying that it is not the fact in financial arrangements that a bond payable punctually and promptly at a short date, desirable for a certain class of pecuniary arrangements, can be negotiated at a lower rate of interest than a bond more prolonged as to its term of operation, and that per contra, the bond having the longest term to run, and the more permanent for reasons connected with its own nature, is also negotiable at the lowest rate of interest, so that you have in this an illustration of extremes meeting. The short bond upon the payment of which punctually absolute reliance can be placed has its uses for certain classes of loans and occupations of capital which do not attach to a bond having a longer time to run; and a bond having the longest time to run, offering a permanent investment, has uses which enable it to be negotiated at a low rate of interest which is not known to a shorter date bond. Have I made myself clear?

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly; I understand the Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. It is a fact perfectly well ascertained and understood in the practical dealings of men accustomed to large financial operations, that you exchange in one case the desirability of a short loan with absolute and punctual repayment for the permanence of investment with a long loan, absolutely secure but only ultimately secure.

Mr. McPHERSON. The absurdity of the proposition upon its face is so apparent that I am really surprised that the Senator confesses he has been deceived by it. I will admit the fact that a bond bearing any rate per cent., even if it be 1 per cent., can be used by speculators in Wall street profitably, who carry over vast sums of money from one day to the other, and any percentage that it bears is an advantage to them; but the market for bonds the world over gives the preference to a long-time bond bearing a fixed rate of interest. If the honorable Senator will place the four hundred million issue of bonds that he proposes shall bear 3½ per cent. interest in Wall street where many of them will go, perhaps all of them, and in connection therewith the $300,000,000 of Treasury notes, with the option of the Secretary of the Treasury at any rate under 3½ per cent. that he can negotiate them at, I wish to know which of the securities will be sought first? What difference will it make to a financier or capitalist whether it is a bond having twenty years to run, or a bond having ten years to run? He pledges the Government security for a loan, a call loan if you please, and the quality or value of the thing pledged determines the sum the borrower will receive.

Mr. BAYARD. If my friend will permit me I will say to him it depends altogether upon the need and uses for which the money is designed. If a man awaiting some grand speculation or enterprise for which he has accumulated for instance half a million dollars, wants that money to be repaid to him at the end of a year, but to keep it useful during that year, and if he can buy the short bond which is bound to be paid at the end of that time, for a low market price, certainly it is an inducement to him to affix certainty to his operation and to borrow the money for just the time he wants it; whereas, on the other hand, if there be some one seeking a permanent investment for the execution of a long-continued trust he will seek that bond which is not to be disturbed by repayment and reinvestment when he does not want it. Therefore the whole question is answered. It depends upon the objects that the investor has in view. For one purpose a short bond is more valuable to him; for another class a long bond is more valuable; and in the mean time the fluctuation that may exist upon the long bond would be hurtful to the man who wants to use his money but for a year or two years, and the certainty of repayment of value at a fixed rate of interest to the man who needs the short loan is secured to him better by the low class of bonds. Therefore the whole thing speaks for itself.

Mr. McPHERSON. A long bond, according to the admission of the Senator, will serve both purposes.

Mr. BAYARD. No, because it is subject to fluctuation.

Mr. McPHERSON. Why can it not subserve both purposes? Suppose the honorable Senator to-day wishes to borrow a million dollars upon a million dollars' worth of 4 per cent. bonds. He does not go to the Government to make that loan. He goes into the financial centers of the country; he goes to London, he goes to Wall street. Those bonds have a fixed market value for that day's transaction. He borrows the money from the capitalist; he does not borrow it from the Government.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is in error——

Mr. McPHERSON. Therefore the 4 per cent. or the 3½ per cent. bonds have a value upon which to loan or to borrow money, just the same as the 3 per cent. or the 3½ per cent. Treasury note, and at the same time they serve the additional purpose of affording an investment for those who desire a permanent investment.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FERRY. Does the Senator not recognize the fact that where there is a large premium on the bond it must necessarily be subject to fluctuation in value? Those who invest in Government securities would not be so apt to invest in a long bond on a high premium subject to fluctuation as in a bond bearing a low rate of interest and selling at par.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am very much surprised that the honorable Senator from Michigan, who I know is a member of the Committee on Finance, should propound such a question to me, if he favored the report the committee has made to the Senate. To-day the 4 per cent. bonds are selling at a premium that yields little more, if any, than 3 per cent. to the purchaser, and liable, of course, to fluctuations, and the action of the committee, in effect bearing its own bonds, have stimulated fluctuations.

Mr. FERRY. The 4 per cent. bonds yield 3.30 per cent.

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes, and at the same time the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate have reported a bill here to pay 3½ per cent. upon bonds to be issued, and therefore have assisted the fluctuation. Had it not been for this action 3 per cent. bonds to-day could have been sold at a premium in the market, but as long as the hope is held out to the purchaser by a Secretary of the Treasury and by a committee of this body, charged by the Senate and by the people of the country with issuing and giving to capitalists the lowest possible rate of interest that our bonds could bear and float them at par, then I must confess that I am not surprised at fluctuations in everything.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me right there he must lose sight of the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury has a discretion. The bill as reported by the Senate Committee on Finance only fixes the maximum of interest on the $300,000,000 Treasury notes, and gives the Secretary of the Treasury the discretion to place it at the lowest rate that is in his judgment practicable under 3½ per cent.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will come to that in a moment. I think, perhaps, my remarks will cover that point, but I will here state that for myself I have no intention of voting the power to gamble with the public credit into the hands of any Treasury officer, present or prospective. The value of the bond of the United States, like any other obligation or commodity, can only be determined by the estimate the public place upon it when offered in open market. The value of a 3 per cent. bond is already fixed at or about par by every-day transactions in the financial world.

The bonds of the Government are in active demand as an investment by those who do not wish to participate in the hazards of business or speculation, but without labor or risk give sure return with absolute security.

No other security can be compared to these bonds. Behind them, and pledged to their redemption, stand the whole wealth of the nation. Taxation cannot reach them, and if a registered bond, even the thief may be disappointed. They are in demand in all the money centers at home and abroad—are wanted by everybody who prefers a perfectly safe to a speculative investment. Unless war shall demand the creation of a new public debt, these bonds will probably be the last the Government will ever issue, and as the demand will increase everywhere in proportion to the increase of wealth and population, in like proportion will their market value appreciate. The interest we promise and pay is the tax-payers' wages, and why throw away one-half per cent. per annum of their hard-earned money?

For Congress now to say, with the light we have, that the discretion between a 3½ per cent. Treasury note and one bearing a less rate of interest should be lodged with the Secretary of the Treasury is equivalent to discrediting our own obligation, and virtually foreordains and establishes the rate at 3½ per cent.

Why then permit our bonds to be hawked about the streets subject to the whim or caprice of a Treasury Secretary or of the expectant purchasers, none of whom will invest in a 3 per cent. bond while Congress proclaims its absurdity by fixing a higher rate?

Mr. A. S. Hatch, of New York, a distinguished financial authority, says upon this subject:

The United States Government is now in a position to dictate terms to its creditors, and to float its public debt at the lowest rate of interest at which any nation has ever been able to borrow money. Its credit is unrivaled, and is so recognized in every financial community on the globe. Its resources and financial vigor, as exhibited in the steady reduction in the volume of the public debt and in the rate of interest at each successive funding, have excited the attention and elicited the admiration of the world. In availing itself of this position it would be more consistent with the high credit which the Government has attained and with its financial record in the past to name its terms for future funding below rather than above the rate of interest represented by the price which its securities have reached in the market in the face of the conditions above referred to.

To that particular point I would especially call the attention of the members of the Finance Committee. Mr. Hatch further says:

I believe that the practicability of negotiating a 3 per cent. funding loan at par depends now only upon the decision of Congress to make the rate 3 per cent. and no more; and that their action in so doing, and in thus removing from the public mind all hope of any higher rate, will of itself determine the result and insure success. I believe also that, should Congress authorize a funding loan bearing 3½ per cent., the bonds so authorized would, within six months after the Government had concluded their negotiation, advance in the market to a price at which they would not yield over 3 per cent. on the investment, and that it would thus be demonstrated that the Government might have saved the one-half per cent. per annum which investors and speculators had gained.

The fact that the 4 per cent. bonds have not yet sold at a price at which they would not yield over 3 per cent. interest (upon which considerable stress seems to be laid by those who doubt the ability of the Government to fund at 3 per cent.) should not discourage the belief that a 3 per cent. loan can be negotiated at par; because, in the first place, the principal, if not the sole, reason why the 4 per cent. bonds have not already approached more nearly to the price at which they would yield but 3 per cent. is, as previously indicated, for the reason that, the question not yet being decided, the hope remains with some that there may yet be 3½ per cent. bonds offered at par; and, in the second place, because a large proportion of investors would prefer to buy a 3 per cent. bond at par rather than pay a high premium for a bond, even though it would ultimately yield a little more than 3 per cent. if held to maturity.

BRITISH CONSOLS.

In the discussions which have taken place in Congress and in the newspapers relative to the practicability of negotiating a funding loan at 3 per cent., frequent allusion has been made to the fact that the British consols bearing the same rate of interest have sold at par or over only at occasional periods, and then only for short intervals, and that they have for the most of the time, for a number of years, sold at less than par. From this it has been argued that if the public debt of Great Britain cannot be maintained at par the United States Government cannot expect to float its 3 per cent. bonds at par. In this argument three important facts seem to have been overlooked: (1.) That the debt of the British Government is steadily increasing, while that of the United States is diminishing; (2.) That the income from British consols is subject to a tax of sixpence in the pound, which reduces the rate of interest which they pay to about 2.92 per cent., and that there is no restriction to prevent the increase of this tax at any time at the will of the government; and (3.) That the market for British consols is limited almost exclusively to Great Britain, while the bonds of the United States are bought and held in every civilized country in the world. These considerations ought to more than overcome the difference between par for a United States 3 per cent. bond, with principal and interest untaxable, and the average price at which British consols have been quoted.

That the credit of the United States Government is fully equal, if not superior, to that of Great Britain at the present time I think cannot be questioned.

The experience of the past has demonstrated that long-time bonds are more attractive as an investment than bonds maturing at a shorter period. If the bonds were bearing a high rate of interest the option as to time of payment would be an important consideration, but 3 per cent. is the lowest rate at which any nation has ever floated its debt; and if it renders the bond more attractive to investors the option to pay a few years sooner or later cannot be of much consequence to the Government.

I agree with the House bill fixing the rate at 3 per cent., and shall oppose with my vote any bill which proposes in the slightest degree to increase the rate above 3 per cent. per annum. I do not agree with the House bill or the bill of the Senate committee in respect of the time at which the bonds are made redeemable and payable. My objection is not born of a belief that a 3 per cent. bond with the specified limit of either bill as to time and option could not be negotiated at par, for I am fully convinced to the contrary; but my objection has a broader basis and looks beyond the Government, whose financial condition and credit is better than that of any other nation, to the tax-ridden people who support it, and who are subjected to more onerous and unjust (unjust because unnecessary) burdens than any other people upon the earth.

In my opinion, it is the duty of Congress to fund the debt at the lowest possible rate of interest; to extend the time for the maturity of the bonds to forty years, so that posterity may bear a share, although a small share, of the burdens created by the exigencies of the war. The present generation have contributed in the tremendous sacrifice of life it involved its full share of the cost. It has suffered in the waste and destruction always attendant upon civil war to an extent never before known in the history of any people. During the five years commencing with 1873 and ending with 1878, the suffering by paralysis in business industry from causes contingent upon the war have had no parallel in the annals of the world. A somewhat disordered financial system, together with outer causes apparently uncontrollable, forced into bankruptcy tens of thousands of our citizens engaged in legitimate and honorable pursuits, closed the doors of our workshops and factories, and compelled the honest and willing laborer to become a tramp and seek bread from door to door. Notwithstanding all this, we have paid off more than one-half our war debt. A grateful people, speaking through their representatives in Congress, have imposed upon the present generation a pension list which in the aggregate is frightful, and the burdens of which cannot be shared by posterity because the pensioner will not be alive to receive it.

The war for the Union was fought for the benefit of all future generations, and it would be only equitable for posterity to share the expense.

The money to pay this debt must be drawn from the people by taxation, and we are annually making drafts upon the people far in excess of the actual needs of the Government. This surplus war taxation is taken from the reproductive industries, from the wages or working fund of the country, and every dollar thus taken above the wants of the Government economically and honestly administered, is a dollar too much.

Let it not be forgotten that there are other taxes bearing heavily upon the shoulders of the people. Faults in legislation and administration by States and municipalities have been followed by a train of evils which will require a degree of prosperity unparalleled in the past to enable the people to reform and repair. Unless this be done, and speedily, bankruptcy and repudiation will be the final result. This is especially true of some of the States of the South whose credit is pledged for tens of millions of dollars, the proceeds of which have never found its way into their treasury vaults or been applied in such way as to add much to the general wealth and prosperity. Is it just, is it wise, under circumstances such as these, and at a time when industry at the South cannot pay its local taxes, to impose upon the people these unnecessary burdens?

Our municipal debt is scarcely less than the national debt, and having been contracted to a large extent since the war, of necessity bears a heavy burden of interest, and, unlike the National Government, but few cities have the financial credit to refund their debts at a lower rate. The aggregate sum drawn from the people on account of interest on State and municipal debts is a heavy burden upon them.

There is not a State in the Union in which the legal rate of interest is less than 6 per cent., and in many of the States where money is most needed to aid development 10 per cent. is maintained as the ruling rate. The agriculturist, manufacturer, and miner are never able to borrow, even when money is abundant, at less than the legal rate; and when capital is sadly needed at the West and South to move the wheels of industry, it is proposed to take annually from fifty to one hundred millions of the working capital of the country, costing for its use at least 10 per cent. per annum, to pay a debt which can be extended indefinitely by the Government at 3 per cent. This may pass for statesmanship, but it can scarcely be called business wisdom. The citizen as a member of the national community, after all his sacrifices in support of the national credit, must pay his own debt bearing 3 per cent. interest by a mortgage loan upon his property or business bearing 10 per cent. It is only necessary to state the proposition to demonstate its injustice and absurdity.

Rapid payment of the public debt, when the Government can borrow at the minimum rate while the citizen is required to pay the maximum rate, is an evil and a loss to the citizen whom the Government is bound by every consideration consistent with financial safety to encourage and protect.

True financial wisdom requires the refunding of the national debt in very long bonds at a very low rate of interest. Relieve our oppressed citizens from the heavy burden of war taxes in time of peace and leave the working capital to fructify in the industries of the people. To this end I favor a 10-40 bond bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum.

Mr. KERNAN. I wish to make one or two suggestions in reference to some statements made by the Senator who has just taken his seat.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I want to know what the proper business before the Senate is.

Mr. KERNAN. I understand the funding bill is before the Senate by common consent. The chairman of the committee said he had full consent to go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the consideration of the first amendment reported by the Committee on Finance to the funding bill.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. What has become of the cattle bill? That is what I want to know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent of the Senate

it is postponed until after the consideration of the funding bill shall have been concluded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood it was informally laid aside and this bill taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous consent of the Senate was given to continuing the consideration of the funding bill until it should be concluded, and after that the pleuro-pneumonia bill is to be taken up and acted upon.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I was not in when that was done.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I shall at this time occupy but a very few minutes; and what I wish to say is in reference to one or two positions taken by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON.] He says that we ought to fund our debt on a long loan running forty years. I have no doubt, from all the information we had before the committee, that we can fund this debt at 3 per cent. if we make a thirty-year bond, possibly at less, but I am one of those who oppose extending the time for this debt to any such date. I believe it is the wise policy of this Government to keep control of an option over paying its debt, to have a short option, and to apply the surplus revenues to the extinguishment of the debt, for I do not believe a permanent debt even at 3 per cent. is a blessing to this country. If you proposed to fund this debt in a thirty-year bond, without the option of taking it up, or a twenty-year bond without the option of taking it up before that time, all my information is that it would go at par at 3 per cent.

But, sir, if you do that, you will have your revenues coming into the Treasury, and, instead of relieving the people from the 3 per cent. interest which runs up, the money will go elsewhere, and we do not always get what is for the good of the people by owing money rather than paying the debt.

If I learned anything from what occurred on this bill at the other end of the Capitol, it was that that body was firm that the Government should have a short option, and be able to pay the debt off as it should have revenue from year to year from twelve months hence onward. Without speaking of that body, which I may not do, I have information that there is a disposition to yield, and (I got it not from them, but from private sources) that that body may yield and agree to pay a higher rate of interest to make a short bond go at par rather than to make a longer bond and put it at a lower rate of interest. I think the gentlemen who entertain that opinion are right. Hence this bill keeps that option in the Government. Here we have $300,000,000 which we can begin to pay as fast as we have a million to spare from the Treasury twelve months from now, and relieve the people from paying interest on so much for twenty or thirty years, which runs up to a great sum.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to know of the Senator from New York what benefit it will be to the people engaged in all kinds of business to be forced to borrow money, as they are in their business, at 6 or 7 per cent. to pay a debt which the Government can borrow and float at 3 per cent.?

Mr. KERNAN. I will give my answer. I believe it is wiser for an individual to pay his debt even when it is drawing low interest than to put off the day of payment and get into schemes and speculations which he will be drawn into if he has that money. I believe it is much wiser for a government than for an individual to use its resources to extinguish its debt rather than to put off the day of payment and pay a low rate of interest upon a long debt.

Mr. McPHERSON. Suppose he has no money to pay, and has to borrow it at 6 or 7 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from New York allow me to state another objection to a long bond?

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is that as long as we have United States bonds in this country we shall never get rid of the national banks, and I am desirous by every means in my power to end them.

Mr. KERNAN. I hope Senators will allow me to proceed. I am just speaking for a brief space.

I repeat, Mr. President, that I believe it is wiser for the people of this country that we should go on and pay this $660,000,000 or $670,000,000 during the next ten years than to extend that law for twenty years at 3 per cent. I believe it is better to pay a higher rate of interest and have the right to extinguish the debt from year to year as we have the revenue than to perpetuate the debt by any long bond. So believing, I favored keeping the option on $300,000,000 of this debt in our hands, beginning twelve months hence. I believe our revenues will enable us to pay it off in a very short time—within five years. Then we shall have to accumulate money to pay $400,000,000 of bonds at 3½ per cent., and I think we can extinguish them inside of ten years from this time.

Sir, it does not often happen that by putting off the day of payment of debts by governments the people are relieved from taxation. I am in favor of paying off this debt at the earliest day and thus relieve the people from taxation, as we should do and as we shall do when we pay off the debt.

I should have been in favor of the House bill if my information led me to believe that we could borrow money on a 3 per cent. 5-20 bond, a bond giving us the right to commence to pay it at our pleasure after five years continuously. I should have been in favor of a bond at 3 per cent. if I had believed we could borrow the money on that bond at par and that it would have remained at par. My information from the best sources I had access to was that there was great danger that that would fail, and if it failed then we should have to go on paying 5 and 6 per cent. on bonds that are outstanding and which these are issued to pay off. My friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who is very accurate, says there would be a difference of over twelve million dollars a year in interest between the 3½ and the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds.

Mr. BECK. Nearly twelve million dollars.

Mr. KERNAN. Nearly twelve million dollars a year for every year. The committee had in view the retaining of the short option which the House inserted in its bill over the $300,000,000 of Treasury notes. Our bill is that the interest on these Treasury notes, which are redeemable after a year from now, shall not exceed 3½ per cent. Why do we say that? Because the information we got is that those notes, or a large portion of those notes, can be negotiated at 3 per cent. or less than 3½ per cent. My friend from New Jersey says that is absurd if the 3 per cent. five-twenties cannot be put out at par. I think he is mistaken. I will not use stronger language. Does he not know that when men have a security that answers the purposes of a call loan they will put their money as they do to-day in New York on call at 2½ or 3 per cent. when the regular rate is 4, 5, or 6 per cent.?

The action of the committee was based on the information they got from various sources. The Secretary of the Treasury ought to be authority to some extent with us; he is supposed to have and I believe has no interest but the welfare of the Government and to make this loan at as low a rate of interest as he can. He says to us that in his judgment, if we authorize these Treasury notes, which are to be paid after twelve months as we please, he will be able to negotiate the whole of them or a large portion of them at 3 per cent., and I doubt not he will do it; but lest there be danger of our being compelled to go on paying 5 and 6 per cent., we say it shall be not exceeding 3½. We give him that latitude. What reason did he give for that? What reason would any man give? He says:

> As a rule, call loans can be put at the lowest rate of interest, and perhaps the rate can be kept down if payment is to be made within a year or so.

And he says further that he thinks these Treasury notes will answer the purpose of investment in the nature of call loans, and that therefore he will be able to negotiate them at 3 per cent. There are two classes of investors, one class who desire to make an investment which shall run a considerable length of time—a permanent investment. There is a large amount of capital now, always a large amount of capital which men desire to put into a security which they can get at par or about par, where they can command the money on it at a short day, because they do not want to make a permanent investment. It is expected that these notes will answer that purpose, and I can see no reason why they will not. We feared 3 per cent. bonds might go below par, having some time to run, and if they should go above par no man would pay a premium to invest money in the nature of a call loan.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator does not propose to make it a 3 per cent.?

Mr. KERNAN. We feared to say that the Secretary should not negotiate these Treasury notes at a higher rate than 3 per cent. lest he should fail, and we be kept paying the 5 and 6 per cent. on the bonds; therefore we have left him discretion, and he gave us his opinion. He says that, in his judgment—

> You can put them on the market only to the extent of the demand for them for convenient use in the nature of call loans.

The 5-20 bonds will not answer for call loans. Men will not put out their money as in call loans by buying four percents, because they are a long investment and are at a premium, and a man cannot afford to pay a premium on money on call when he wants his money perhaps in a few months to use in business.

Most of the argument made by my friend from New Jersey to-day was made to me by an intelligent man, and I doubt not he believed it. My objection to him was: "But suppose we fail, my friend, to negotiate at 3, we are paying $12,000,000 a year on the fives and sixes to get the money," and to that he had no answer. He did answer at first when I talked about it with him: "There is no trouble; we are not bound to pay the fives and sixes; it is only an option." But I say we are bound to pay the fives and sixes for the benefit of the people, that we may save them $12,000,000 a year, the difference between the interest at 3½ and at 5 and 6 per cent.

I think this part of the bill is clearly proper. The Secretary of the Treasury has expressed the opinion that he will be able to negotiate these Treasury notes at 3 per cent. or a little over, and under 3½ they will be taken by capitalists seeking temporary investments. They are to be paid at an early day. On the contrary, his opinion is that he will not be able to get the money on $400,000,000 of 5-20 bonds at 3 per cent. He hoped he might, but he feared he would not. I do not want to run any risk. The people save interest by paying 3½ rather than paying 5 or 6 per cent. on the bonds that we have an option to take up.

I think that the Senator from New Jersey makes a mistake—I will say nothing more—when he talks in the most scornful way of the judgment of the committee as "absurd" and "amazing." Why, sir, they have drawn this bill giving our Secretary the right to put out all the short bonds that are wanted and to begin to pay them off in twelve months, and to put them at 3 per cent. if he can, or under that, or a little above, but not above 3½ per cent. Then the $400,000,000 of five-twenties we have put at as low a rate of interest as on the information we get from official and non-official sources we think it would be safe for us to say we could raise the money promptly and extinguish the fives and sixes that we are paying heavy rates of interest on from day to day.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator allow me to offer an apology right there?

Mr. KERNAN. Not to me.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think the Senator ought to permit me to explain.

Mr. KERNAN. I will.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator says that I have expressed great surprise at the action of the committee and called their action absurd, and so forth, because they had recommended to the Senate to issue a 3½ per cent. bond. So far as I am concerned, no apology should be required of me. It is rather the bond market which owes him the apology. He is confronted by the fact that in every-day business transactions on the street 3 per cent. bonds can be floated at par. When I declare the action of the committee absurd, I am simply giving street quotations which I think prove the absurdity. It is not my expression, it is the expression of the market which challenges his statement.

Mr. KERNAN. The Senator said that the committee was acting in a way to depress the credit of our Government. I say we are acting in a way which will elevate the character of this Government and will show that we will not let bonds run at 5 or 6 per cent. even until the next session of Congress for the want of a Treasury note that can be negotiated at not exceeding 3½ per cent., and as much less as the Secretary can do it, and for the want of a bond for which we allow, if that rate is necessary to get the money, 3½ per cent.

I do not think anything is to be said about Wall street here. I say nothing about it. I take all the information I can from it, and my information is that probably you can there borrow money on these Treasury notes at 3 per cent. from people who want to make investments in the nature of call loans, and we can certainly borrow it at 3½, and with the five-twenties promptly extinguish the bonds drawing 5 and 6 per cent. interest at once and save interest. That we can certainly do at 3½, and there is no certainty that we can do it at 3 per cent. As an individual I think I would treat my debt in that way, and believing it wise for an individual I know it is much better for a government, and therefore I am in favor of the short option. I am against perpetuating this debt if I can borrow money at 2 per cent. The business of the Government is to pay its debt and relieve the people from taxation, and that I think this bill as reported will do, and therefore I am in favor of it.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I think that perhaps under the circumstances it would be proper for me with respect to certain points raised by the Senator from New York to say a word. He states in his speech that the weight of opinion on investigation by the committee was against a 3 per cent. bond. I suppose the committee came in contact with gentlemen of well-known financial ability and of financial strength, gentlemen who had every interest upon earth to have this Government issue a bond bearing 3½ per cent. interest, because that made a better investment for the money that they desired to invest in Government bonds.

Now, sir, it has been my good fortune within the past week to come in contact with hundreds of people engaged in large financial enterprises, because I have made it my business for the past three days to investigate as fully as I could the sentiment of those who knew better than myself as to whether a 3 per cent. bond could be sold at par upon the market, and in no case did I find a single disinterested man who did not openly declare that he had no doubt of success in floating a 3 per cent. loan.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask the Senator if in these investigations he has not universally found that class of men say that a bond, in order to be negotiated at 3 per cent., should be upon long time, a much longer time than proposed by the committee? Do they not universally couple the two conditions together?

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator will remember that we have neither fixed the rate nor the time.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that, but the committee make the proposition of a higher rate of interest and a shorter time. I have made some examination and investigation in the same direction as the Senator to whom I am addressing this question; and I have found the same class of men universally say that upon very long time there is no doubt a bond could be negotiated at a lower rate of interest, and many of them favor it.

Mr. McPHERSON. There comes more authority, another Senator in opposition to the proposition of the Senator from Delaware. The Senator from Delaware proclaims that a certain number of bonds, to wit, the so-called Treasury notes which the committee recommend to be issued, can be sold to better advantage at a very short time than at a long time. I declare that proposition most singular, because the long bond can be used for all the purposes that the Treasury note can be used for, whereas it can also be used for the other purposes of which the Senator from New Hampshire speaks.

Mr. EATON. May I ask my friend if he has any doubt whatever that a ten-year 3 per cent. bond could be floated?

Mr. McPHERSON. I will say to the Senator that I have no doubt of it, and still further, if the financial men with whom I come in contact entertained such doubts they would be expressed by them. If it is the intention of the Senate of the United States, with the experience of the past confronting us, to leave to the option and discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury the power to say whether we shall pay 3½ per cent., if he thought best, then it seems to me we are putting in his hands power that we ought not to. I believe that if the Secretary of the Treasury, upon whose shoulders should be placed a portion of the responsibility, perhaps I may be allowed to say a large portion, had so advised, and the Committee on Finance of the Senate had promptly reported back to the Senate a bill authorizing the issue of a 3 per cent. bond with a sufficient length of time for its maturity to make it attractive, whether it be thirty years or forty, the public mind would have been settled and concluded upon the question, and there would have been no more difficulty in floating the 3 per cent. bond than there would be in floating one at 3½ per cent. But the expectation has been held out to the public that a 3½ per cent. bond would be offered. Why? Because of the fear that nobody would buy a 3 per cent. bond.

The honorable Senator from Delaware further says that if we find at the expiration of one year, the time of the option given to the Treasury notes, that we can float them at a less rate of interest, very well; we can again renew these short bonds. What does that mean? It means a new commission to a syndicate; it means another half per cent. for the issue of the new bonds; it means another option to the Secretary of the Treasury; it means that the Government credit is left entirely in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury and that we, the agents of the people, whose duty it is to maintain it, have delegated the responsibility to him.

The honorable Senator from Delaware said that the bond is a bond of unity and security. I confess that, and when I submitted the proposition to the Senate that the bond should have forty years to run I did it simply because I thought that posterity should pay a portion of the debt; but if it be a bond of unity and security as well, the longer it is extended the better. It should be extended indefinitely upon the argument of the Senator.

The Senator from New York speaks of the option. He is not in favor of having the option extended beyond five or ten years.

Mr. KERNAN. Beyond five.

Mr. McPHERSON. He says five, and that he fears the bond cannot be floated at less than 3½ per cent. interest. That is his proposition. Now I declare the bond can be negotiated at 3 per cent. interest. We will suppose it to be negotiated at 3 per cent. interest. It then becomes the lowest interest-bearing bond that any government has ever negotiated at par. What difference, I submit to the honorable Senator, does it make whether the Government has an option of ten years or forty years on a bond which is bearing a lower rate of interest than any government ever paid before in the world?

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to answer. Of course if I believed, as the Senator says he does, that we could float $400,000,000 at 3 per cent., I would go for that; but fearing we cannot, I go for 3½ per cent.

Now for the other part of the question; I want to prevent the people being taxed beyond five years. That is the reason I am for the short option. I want to take fifty or sixty or seventy millions of surplus in the Treasury and extinguish that much of the three or three-and-a-half percents, whichever is the rate, five years hence and pay off the other $300,000,000 before that time. I do so because I think that is better for the people. We had better refund the debt, having a right to extinguish it in a few years, than to borrow at a lower rate of interest and go on paying a large amount in interest for year after year, the principal being the same.

Mr. McPHERSON. To state it in other phrase, the honorable Senator is in favor of compelling fifty millions of people who have been taxed beyond measure and endurance, who have been taxed more than any people on this earth were ever taxed before, who have bravely and patriotically stood up and defended the credit of their Government, to pay in five years what posterity ought to pay thirty or forty years hence, when we shall have one hundred or perhaps one hundred and fifty millions of people, with increased development and with increased means to tax.

Mr. KERNAN. How many years must this 3 per cent. bond run until we shall have paid more than the principal in interest?

Mr. McPHERSON. I will answer the honorable Senator. I do not agree with him that the Government option should begin in one year. Let the bonds run forty years with the option to pay beginning in ten years. I will trust to the intelligence of any Congress that the people of this country will send here for the next twenty years to keep this debt at 3 per cent. and continue to pay 3 per cent. interest, so that the business men of the country may keep their capital in their enterprises costing a low rate of interest.

Mr. KERNAN. Why make a forty-year loan with an option of one year, if you are in favor of having a perpetual debt that somebody may have cheap capital as you say? Why should you not borrow for forty years and have no option about it?—Why do you want an option if you are not going to exercise it?

Mr. McPHERSON. How can the honorable Senator tell me I am in favor of a perpetual debt, when I have stated expressly that I was not in favor of it? I am not strenuous about the option, as I said before. I will leave that to the intelligence of the people for all time. If the people of this country, through their representatives, are willing to take the working capital out of the country that is needed by the people in their industries to pay a debt which the Government can borrow at 3 per cent., well and good, they shall have the privilege. I shall not deny them the privilege.

Now, Mr. President, there is but one other point that I wish to speak about. It is proposed arbitrarily to fix the rate upon the bonds at 3½ per cent., and it is proposed to leave the Treasury note in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, to gamble with it as he sees fit.

Mr. KERNAN. To borrow lower if he can.

Mr. McPHERSON. I prefer my term, "to gamble with it," because there is no limit whatever fixed by the discretion of the committee or by the judgment of Congress. It is left solely with the Secretary of the Treasury, only that it be no more than 3½ per cent. The bond having a long time to run, with an arbitrary rate fixed at 3½ per cent., no doubt will be a very good investment. That bond, I think, in thirty days will sell at 5 or 6 per cent. profit to the syndicate. A Treasury note at the rate of 3½ per cent., I have no doubt, can be sold at par; but for the life of me I cannot understand that kind of financial wisdom that proclaims that the Secretary can sell a Treasury note, worth less in the market than the bond, at a lower rate than 3½ per cent., when an arbitrary rate of 3½ per cent. is fixed on the bond. Would it not be a great deal more consistent to leave the whole thing to the Secretary and his syndicate?

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I rise to inquire what is the present status of this bill? Are we in Committee of the Whole, or to what point is the discussion now being addressed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The pending question is upon the first amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROWN. I ask that that amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "bonds," in line 15 of section 1, it is proposed to strike out "in the" and insert "to an."

Mr. EATON. Are we now on the verbal amendments proposed by the Senator from Delaware?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the verbal amendments suggested by the Senator from Delaware were all adopted. The pending amendment will be again reported.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 15, after the word "bonds," it is proposed to strike out "in the" and insert "to an;" and after the word "amount," in the same line, to strike out "of;" so as to make the clause read "the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issued bonds to an amount not exceeding $400,000,000," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was, in line 16, section 1, after the word "dollars," to insert "of denominations of fifty dollars or some multiple of that sum."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance a moment in regard to that amendment. It is to insert "of denominations of fifty dollars or some multiple of that sum." Does not that leave discretionary power with the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the whole $400,000,000 in any multiples of fifty dollars? Does it require him at all to issue small bonds?

Mr. BAYARD. Bonds in any multiple of $50.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. May he not issue them all in thousand-dollar bonds and strictly comply with this law?

Mr. BAYARD. Oh, yes.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Was it the purpose of the committee to leave that discretion with him?

Mr. BAYARD. It was. It means that the smallest bonds shall be $50, but it does not limit the size of the largest, provided it is some multiple of fifty.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That leaves it discretionary with him whether he shall issue a fifty-dollar bond or not.

Mr. BAYARD. I suppose it will be according to the demand of the subscriptions.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. But it is in his power under the language of this bill not to issue any bond under a thousand dollars.

Mr. BAYARD. No, I apprehend it depends entirely on the subscriptions made for them and the denominations in which the purchaser desires to have the bonds furnished.

Mr. INGALLS. He might issue all in one bond.

Mr. BAYARD. If any purchaser would take it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Would it not do to strike out the words "or some multiple of" and insert "and multiples of;" so as to read "denominations of $50 and multiples of that sum?"

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection. We simply in this followed the language of the funding bill of 1870, under which there has been an ascertainment practically of the meaning of these words; and we thought it was better to follow language which had been acted upon than take other which might be open to new construction. That is all.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Is this the precise language of the act of 1870?

Mr. BAYARD. That is the language of the act of 1870, and that was the reason why it was adopted.

Mr. BECK. I did not hear distinctly what the chairman of the Finance Committee said; but when the bill was before the committee I made the same objection, and the old law was turned to, and it was found that we were now following the language of it, and under it there never was any difficulty in issuing bonds of the various denominations required.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I will state my object in making the inquiry. I am strongly in favor of popularizing this loan to as great an extent as it can possibly be done. I am satisfied that a large portion of these bonds would be taken at first hand in many portions of our country if an opportunity were offered to the people living in those sections to take them. Under the practice that has prevailed heretofore, they have been taken in immense quantities by syndicates who have made a profit in selling them out again to individual holders. I think I shall before the bill passes away offer an amendment that may look to making it imperative on the Secretary that he shall afford to the people in all portions of the country an opportunity of subscribing to this loan if they desire.

Mr. BAYARD. I can understand perfectly well the desirability of such a result. I think it would be a fortification of the public credit that it should be held in small sums as broadly as possible by the population of the United States. I have no question of that. As to its praticability another question will arise. We had some evidence of it about two years ago, when $40,000,000 of certificates were sold in sums of $10 and multiples thereof; but bankers and others desiring to obtain large amounts employed twenty, thirty, or fifty individuals to come and make subscriptions for them separately and then put them altogether.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That is true, but they were only offered in a few places in the country.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection to considering the question if practicable. The committee did not desire to exclude such a result, but they did not see precisely how they could compel it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I do not say it can be done, but I think the chance ought to be afforded for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance in line 16 of section 1, after the word "dollars," to insert "of denominations of fifty dollars or some multiple of that sum."

Mr. TELLER. Will it be in order after we have adopted that to amend it?

Mr. MORRILL. You can add to it.

Mr. TELLER. It is to be amended now, I understand, if it is to be amended at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It may be amended in the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. Then I move to amend it now by inserting, unless the Senator from Iowa has some amendment prepared——

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I think if the words "or some multiple" were stricken out and the words "a multiple" inserted, it might do; or let the Senator from Colorado propose his amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I move to insert after the word "of," in line 16, the words "ten, twenty, and;" so as to read "of denominations of ten, twenty, and fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum."

Mr. BAYARD. I will say to the honorable Senator that is reducing the interest-bearing debt by coupons to an infinitesimal gradation, and, besides, they are to be registered or coupon. I really think that it is carrying the desire to popularize the loan rather far. Fifty dollars, I think, is about the lowest bond that should be issued. The Treasury notes are down to $10; so that that mode of investment can suit the class of purchasers the Senator desires to accommodate. I think the fifty-dollar bond, if it is to be a coupon bond, is small enough in all reason.

Mr. TELLER. These are not necessarily a coupon bond; they may be either registered or coupon.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Colorado if he desires to compel the United States to make payment at its Treasury of the sum of seventeen cents, a separate transaction, separate record, which this would do by the semi-annual interest on $10?

Mr. TELLER. I have not any very great anxiety on this subject. I believe, however, the true principle is to have the people of the United States hold these bonds as far as it is possible and practicable. There is a class of people who will buy these bonds, and they will buy them in sums of $10 when they have got $10; when they have got $10 they will put it in a bond; when they have got $10 more they will put that in. I do not know whether there will be a great number of them. There were $40,000,000 taken of the other bonds that were issued in ten-dollar subscriptions. I know that they passed ultimately into the hands of the large capitalists of the country, with the exception of about a million, I believe, still held by people in small sums. I do not know but that $10 is a pretty small sum for a bond. I do not know but that fifty is right; but it seems to me that if it could be done without practical inconvenience it would be well to make these bonds small enough to be used for the purpose of saving money instead of putting it in the savings-banks. There has been in the last few years a great deal of money lost to the depositors in savings-banks, and $10 is a large sum in many of the savings-banks to be deposited at one time.

I think myself that in dealing with these questions it would be a very good idea to keep in mind that some of the people in this country do not count their money by millions. I think the legislation has generally proceeded in this country on the theory that the people of ordinary means would not touch these securities. I think that a great number of them would, and of the many millions of dollars that are held by savings-banks a great deal would be put, if the opportunity were offered, into this kind of securities. It is true the holder might only draw seventeen cents interest semi-annually if he only had $10; and it might be a practical inconvenience for the Government to pay such a small sum; and yet I do not know that that is any reason we should try to aggregate all this character of securities in the hands of a few men.

I believe I will let the Senate vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance to line 16.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in line 18 of section 1, after the word "three," to insert "and one-half," so as to read "which shall bear interest at the rate of three and one-half per cent. per annum," &c.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to, and I call for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say a single word. I have no intention to enter into an elaborate discussion of this measure. While it was considered in the Finance Committee, I labored faithfully to make the bill as good as I could. I tried to better it rather than defeat it. At the time it was under consideration there two or three weeks ago, I was impressed with the belief that a three-and-a-half bond was necessary. I have had much information on the subject since, which I had not at that time, and I have so far modified my opinion as to reach the conclusion that I shall vote against this amendment of the committee. The committee is not surprised at my position. I reserved the right at all times to vote against any amendment to the bill if I saw fit to do so. Consequently I shall, as I conceive in the interest of the people, vote for a 3 per cent. bond. I believe from information which has reached me from most reliable sources and from the heaviest business men, and if I can use the expression moneyed men, that the bonds can be floated at that rate. I shall vote accordingly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Indiana for what time a 3 per cent. bond can be floated?

Mr. VOORHEES. The time mentioned in the bill as it came from the House, 5-10, though I make no particular objection to the extension of the time for the maturity of the bond, because the option is the value to the Government. The redeemability of the bond at five years is the value to the Government so far as time is concerned.

Mr. EATON. I shall detain the Senate but a moment. My own impression is, from conversation with financiers of great ability and men of great wealth, that a 3 per cent. 10-30 bond can be floated with ease. I have no doubt of it any more than I had previous to the last funding operation that a 3.30 or a 3½ per cent. bond could have been floated then.

Mr. BAYARD. A thirty-year bond?

Mr. EATON. A thirty-year bond. I do not believe a 5-10-year bond can be floated at all at 3 per cent. I thought before that a 3½ per cent. bond was all that the Government ought to issue. The Secretary of the Treasury thought a 4½ per cent. bond only could be floated; but we compromised on 4. I have been sorry ever since that I compromised on 4. There is no question now but what the bonds could have been floated at 3½ with perfect ease at that time.

I was very much struck with the argument of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the honorable Senator from Delaware. I think it very important that we should pass a bill, and I shall vote for this bill as it comes from the committee, if it cannot be changed. I think it ought to be changed, and therefore I shall endeavor to change it. Lest I might be mistaken that a 3 per cent. bond could be floated, I would be perfectly willing to say "an interest at the rate of 3½ per cent.;" and that makes a difference of a good many hundred thousand dollars annually.

Now, can my friend from Delaware, with his means of information, (which are certainly greater than mine, being placed as he is as chairman of the Finance Committee in connection with the business men of the country to a greater extent than I,) entertain any doubt but what a bond could be floated at an interest of 3½ per cent.? Is there any business man on the floor who doubts it? If it can be done, it ought to be done. I have no doubt whatever, from all the information I can gain, that a 10-30 bond at 3 per cent. can be floated and be worth par.

Now, the question is, and that is a matter of argument, whether a 5-20 bond is not better for the tax-payer at 3½ per cent. than a 10-30 at 3. There is room for argument; it is not entirely a one-sided question. One is 3 per cent. and the other 3½; but at the end of five years instead of ten years, if the Government is in funds, there might be called in $100,000,000, and then the entire interest on that $100,000,000 would cease, and the people would not have to be taxed in order to meet that demand. Therefore it is a matter of fair argument. I should be willing to compromise by calling it 3½ per cent., and I hope the Senate will adopt that. I ask my friend from Delaware if, under all the circumstances, with the condition of the credit of the country to-day, he cannot accept that amendment. I am very frank to say to him that I shall vote for this bill with the 3½ per cent. rate if I cannot get it better, for it is important that we should agree upon some bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, in reply to the interrogatory of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, I will only say that the language reported to the Senate by the amendment of the committee is the result of the best judgment they could form of what it was advisable for the Government to do under the circumstances. I can conscientiously advise the Senate to accept the proposition of the committee, but I cannot advise them to accept the amendment suggested by my friend from Connecticut.

I do not propose to repeat any of the arguments which I advanced this morning in support of this project of the committee, but I am satisfied that there ought not to be experimental legislation; that we owe it to the country and to the importance of the subject before us to make this bill a certainty and a success, and I do here declare that in my judgment the great weight of that opinion most entitled to influence is in favor of fixing the rate of interest on these bonds at not less than 3½ per cent. I do not propose to repeat the reasons I have heretofore given for that, I say to my friend from Connecticut because I hope that the amendment which he has suggested rather than moved will not meet the approval of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if we are to fund this debt at all, I am in favor of funding it at the lowest possible rate and at the shortest possible time. If I had my way, I would do exactly for the nation what I would do for myself. I would give my note payable on or before a given day, and before that day arrived pay as much of it as I possibly could. That relates to the time. As to the rate of interest I am perfectly satisfied that the whole of this debt can be easily floated and kept up at 3 per cent. if we were to reverse the option to pay at twelve months from date. The national banks could absorb the whole of this entire amount; and if you were to put it at 2 per cent. or 1 per cent. instead of 3½ per cent., they would take the whole of it.

Now, give them 3½ per cent., and what does it amount to? It gives to the banks 30 per cent. on their capital invested. There is no analogy between the consols of Great Britain and the bonds of the United States. Those consols are taxed to support the government; the bonds of the United States are not taxed, neither the bonds themselves nor the interest, nor the income accruing from them. Then in this country these bonds are the basis of the circulating medium. A banker takes $100,000 of bonds to the Treasury when he wants to extend the capital of his bank, and they give him $90,000 of circulating money just as good as he paid for the bonds themselves. He then is out but $10,000, and at 3 per cent. it brings him 30 per cent. per annum. Does any man doubt that the banks will take all these bonds? They need them all; they must take them all. They must take them at 1 per cent. as well as at 3½. Why should you pay 3½ per cent.? It is a bonus to the banks; it is a bounty to the capital of the country. Gentlemen may talk about subsidies and bounties, but here is a subsidy or a bounty that we are proposing to the moneyed interests of the country. Why, sir, there is in the city of New York alone capital enough to absorb this $650,000,000. There is a demand around the bourse in New York for cash every day absolutely sufficient to absorb the whole of this $650,000,000 if the banks do not take a dollar of it. Does any man doubt that? Why, look at the clearances every week in New York at the clearing-houses; in a single week they amount to more than the whole of the bonds that we propose to put on the market. Can they have any better security for the short loans that they need for their speculations, for use at the exchanges, for the purchase and sale of stocks, than these bonds? And can you doubt that they will be readily taken in a week? My word for it they will all be taken in a single week. There will not be a bond on the market one week after we pass the law and arrangements are made to issue them.

I am opposed to the whole scheme of extending this debt of the country. I think what is good policy for the father of a family is good policy for the nation. If I believed I was about to die the first thing I would do would be to leave my estate so that my children could get it; I would want to leave it clear to my children, without a debt upon it, without a mortgage upon it; and as a Senator of the United States legislating for my posterity and your posterity and future generations, I would be glad to do as much of the work as possible to pay off the whole of the debt while I live, and I hope to see it paid, and I believe I shall see it paid before I die. We shall have a surplus in the Treasury of more than $110,000,000 next year; we shall have more than that the year after, and in ten years from to-day, if the same economical policy is pursued that is now being pursued, we shall have a surplus revenue to apply upon the debt of more than $200,000,000 a year.

Therefore, sir, I am opposed to this amendment adding one-half per cent. to the rate of interest fixed in the House bill. Suppose we do not negotiate this bond, what harm will be done? Suppose the banks refuse—but they will not refuse—we can just issue Treasury notes and pay off the whole and take their circulation, cancel their bonds, and save the country $400,000,000. That is what we can do. Give to these bonds and give to these Treasury certificates that you issue the power of paying duties at the custom-house, and they will be at par with gold to-morrow. Your greenbacks would have been at par years ago if you had made them receivable at the custom-house for public dues. Who doubts that? What Senator on this floor doubts that?

I did not rise to make a speech, but just to enter my solemn protest against the pending amendment. I will vote against this increase of the interest. I will vote for the bill as it came from the House. I may have something to say upon another amendment as to the fifth section, but I care not to say more on this now. I am for the shortest time and the lowest possible rate of interest suggested, because I am perfectly satisfied, not only from my own opinion and judgment, but from that of the ablest bankers in the United States, that these bonds will be greatly sought after and caught up in less than a fortnight after we shall have passed this bill.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, one word fell from my friend from Delaware which I did not like to hear, and regret that he used. In attacking my amendment he used the language "experimental legislation," giving it a great deal of emphasis. He said he was opposed to experimental legislation. My friend will not deny himself that the best financiers in the United States assert beyond question that a 10-30 bond can be floated at 3 per cent. There is no experiment about it any more than there is about a proposition that a bond can be floated at 3½ per cent. We have not floated any yet; but it can be done. The intelligence of the country knows that it can be done. It ought not to be called an experiment. We know what it is worth. We know what the 4 per cent. bond is worth to-day.

Mr. ALLISON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. We have now 4½ per cent. bonds maturing in about ten years. At the price of those bonds in New York, is it not a fact that those bonds yield to the investor 3.41 per cent.?

Mr. EATON. The 4 per cent. bonds yield 3.15.

Mr. ALLISON. I am speaking of bonds maturing in ten years from this time.

Mr. EATON. I cannot tell about that, because I have not had my attention directed to it; but I was told three or four years ago that it was experimental legislation to issue a 3½ per cent. bond, because, forsooth, the Secretary of the Treasury said that it was experimental legislation to undertake it, and therefore I and others were foolish enough to compromise on 4 per cent.

Now, it is experimental legislation if we put it below 3½, when the 4 per cent. bond to-day is not paying more than 3.15 per cent. to the purchaser. I have no question on this subject, not the slightest in the world; and it is not an experiment. I desire to say to my friend from Delaware that I represent a people who do not desire to experiment either upon the securities or the currency of this country. They are solid men, and it is a solid State, though a small State, desiring good money and good security, and to do everything for the Government in good faith. We want no experimental legislation in Connecticut, but we desire to float the securities of the United States at as low a price as judicious men say is proper; not to experiment; not to put them, as my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] says, where the banks will gobble up the whole issue if you put it at 1 per cent., or 2, or 2½. That would be somewhat of an experiment, and I would not like to try legislation of that character; but I deny the propriety of the use of the word "experimental" in connection with the amendment which I had the honor to offer. The very condition of the credit of the country to-day and of its securities to-day shows that what I have offered is not an experiment, but an absolute, fixed fact; and all men who can read can see it. The man who takes up to-day the price of the securities of the United States in Wall street, or in Boston, or anywhere else, knows that 3½ per cent. is a fixed fact to-day.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I desire to express my sincere regret that the sensibilities of my friend from Connecticut have been in any way aroused by the use of the term "experimental" as applied to the proposed rate of interest in this bill. I certainly had no design to suggest that he meant to apply dangerous experiments upon the financial interests of the country; and if he supposes or if any one else can suppose that the phrase would bear that construction, I would most unhesitatingly withdraw it, for nothing was further from my mind than to speak with disrespect or suggest the faintest doubt of the judicious and solid character of my friend's intention toward the credit of his country. Let me explain what I meant.

Here is a question of opinion, in many respects as yet unsolved by fact. The two branches of the same body to whom this question is at present committed for deliberation, have an apparent difference as to the rate of interest. One thinks that 3 per cent. is the proper and just rate which this Government should pay upon its loans; the other thinks it would be impracticable, that it would be experimental, in a degree dangerous to the welfare of the country, to attempt without succeeding to float a loan at that rate, and therefore suggests a higher rate. If one class of opinion considers that the 3 per cent. will be a success ergo it must consider that 3½ will be still more so. The greater includes the less, and therefore both parties would agree that the most feasible and practical way is to try 3½ per cent. I assume that to be certainly admitted. That is all I meant, that there was a rate which was agreed upon which no one considered experimental, but all agreed could be a success. I meant to contradistinguish that accepted proposition upon all sides to the suggestion that the loan could be floated at a lower rate. That was all I meant. There was not the most remote intention on my part to reflect in the least degree upon the judgment, much less upon the integrity of my honorable friend from Connecticut; and I am sorry he should have ever conceived for an instant that anything I said was capable of that construction.

I will only repeat here that as we are dealing yet with the unknown, and almost with the untried, the road of safety is the road of certainty. We know, as near as we may know anything in the future, that this loan is practicable at the rate reported by the Senate Committee on Finance. We know the benefit and advantage to the country of the reduction to that point. We know as well as we may know anything that that which we propose is practicable. We do not know that a less rate would be so, and there is a great body of opinion, to which my judgment has yielded, that it is not practicable at a lower rate than that named by the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then am I to understand the Senator from Delaware to mean that if we were to put the rate at 4 per cent. the success of the scheme would be absolutely certain?

Mr. BAYARD. It is not necessary to reduce this thing to an absurdity, Mr. President. I am only speaking of the bill before us and trying to do so respectfully.

Mr. VEST. A very brief word, sir. If I understand the chairman of the Committee on Finance, he supposes the idea of self-interest will control in this matter. Now I say the 4 per cent. bonds of the Government payable in 1907 are worth 113¼ or 113½. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance what is the difference in the market value of 4 per cent. bonds at 113½ and a 3 per cent. bond of the Government at par? I undertake to say that if the calculation is made, there is hardly a shadow of difference in the monetary value of the two bonds.

What is it that gives value to the securities of the Government? First, the certainty of payment; second, the exemption from taxation; third, the fact, the overwhelming fact, that these bonds are the basis for the circulation of the country. Is there a man who believes that you can legislate out of existence, except by destruction of their charters, the United States national banks?

Now, sir, these 3 per cent. bonds have all the essential requisites of the four percents. They have the Government guaranteeing their payment; they are exempt from taxation, and they can be made the basis for the circulation of the national banks, and, as I said before, in that last distinction is the great value of the United States bonds. The chairman of the Finance Committee tells us that it is not the amount of money in the Treasury to be used for redemption that gives value to these bonds, but it is the credit of the Government. The credit of the Government is as much pledged to the payment of the three percents as of the four percents. As the Senator from Kentucky has told us, here is a national bank with $100,000 capital; they take from the Government 3 per cent. bonds; they also receive from the Government $90,000 in national-bank notes; they loan the $90,000 in national-bank notes, as they do in my State and throughout the West, for 10 per cent., payable in advance, amounting to 10.62 per cent. every year, and they receive for the $10,000 capital not put in the form of notes in this way $3,000 interest per annum, or 30 per cent. No mortal man ever invented a scheme which gave more to capital and less to the people. I have done as much hard fighting against that organization as any member on this floor. I fought them and their allies in the republican party of the State of Missouri last fall. I have always been the constant and persistent enemy to many of the dogmas of the greenback party in the United States, but I stand here to-day to assert that this bill reported by this committee is giving a subsidy of 1 per cent. to the national banks of the United States. They are the parties who are to derive profit from it. It will not be sixty days after the issue of these bonds before the national banks will absorb them and reap a harvest from them.

I cannot vote for this amendment of the Committee on Finance; I cannot vote for this bill. I do not propose to give my sanction to a bill which increases by one-half of 1 per cent. the interest upon these bonds to go into the hands of the capitalists of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, while the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] was asking his question, my friend from Tennessee on my right [Mr. BAILEY] made a computation of what is the return to the investor on the purchase to-day of the 4 per cent. bonds of the United States at 113. The return will be found to be 3.54 per cent. That is the return on the market value to-day—3.54. That is the calculation and it is subject to any gentleman's criticism.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask him and the Senator who made the calculation if he counts the loss of the premium at the expiration of the term of the bonds, or only the rate on the present principal?

Mr. BAYARD. I am not sorry the honorable Senator has asked that question, because the loss of that premium of 13 per cent. is spread over thirty years, which my honorable friend from Missouri has apparently entirely forgotten. The question of your capacity to float a loan depends, of course, in some degree, upon the permanence of that loan. It was that which I endeavored to show in comparison with the loans of first-class European commercial nations, that there the rate of income to the investor at the current market prices of those securities was much higher than that proposed by the Senate Committee on Finance in the measure now before Congress. The French rentes which are interminable except at the pleasure of the government are selling to-day, the 3 per cent. rentes, at 84 and a fraction, paying thereby between 5 and 6 per cent. to the investor, and the management of French finance has been in the last seventy years a matter of common admiration by all engaged in the study of that science.

But here the honorable Senator from Missouri asks how can you refuse to issue your bonds at 3 per cent. payable in thirty years. The terms of the 4 per cent. bonds of the United States were, in the law before me, that "after thirty years from the date of their issue" they were to be paid, but not before. Therefore if you will substitute for the policy of prompt and rapid extinguishment as fast as practicable of the public debt, the doctrine that a permanent public debt is not a permanent injury, unquestionably by stretching your operation over a long space of time you can negotiate at a lower rate of interest. There is no doubt about that. But between the two Houses it has not been a question only of the rate of interest per annum, but it has been a question as to the length of the time of the obligation. This bill as it came to us, the Senate will see, provided for paying the $400,000,000 of bonds at the pleasure of the United States after five years and payable in ten years; 5-10 was the term, at 3 per cent., 5-20 is the term proposed by the Senate Committee on Finance at 3½ per cent. The four percents, whose premium has been stated here by the honorable Senator from Missouri with entire accuracy at about thirteen, the Government has no option to redeem whatever may be the favorable condition of which it may seek to avail itself. He is even leaving out of his calculation, I submit to him, one of the most important elements for the diminution of the charge of interest; he is leaving out of his calculation the permanence of this debt, its perpetuity for thirty years. He is dealing to-day in his mind with a bond payable in five years at the option of the Government, and in twenty years absolutely. How can he then discuss this rate without discussing at the same time the length of time for which the investment is to remain secure and undisturbed?

Transmuting your investment in 4 per cent. bonds payable in 1907, thirty-year bonds of the United States into their value, you have a shade of interest to the investor higher than that proposed by the Senate Committee on Finance upon this bill. Supposing the 13 per cent. premium to be at this time a fair average and not a high fluctuation caused by an abnormal condition of affairs from the pressure of an apprehended lower-rate bond, for a bond at a lower rate necessarily puts a higher price on bonds bearing a higher rate; but leaving that out and spreading that 13 per cent. over thirty years, what is the result? When you consider the loss of the premium you have paid, at the end of that time, you have that which at the utmost is more than equal in its return to the investor than the rate of interest proposed by this committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The 4 per cent. bond to-day has but twenty-six years to run, and if you pay $114 to-day for a one-hundred-dollar bond the premium is only ¼ per cent. a year. Considering the time it will have to run, the premium at ¼ per cent. a year reduces the bond to a 3¼ per cent., to say nothing of the loss of interest on the fourteen-dollar premium. My friend from Connecticut has made the calculation and says it amounts to 3.15 per cent.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator still leaves out of consideration the length of the bond.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the bond has but twenty-six years to run.

Mr. BAYARD. To an investor the premium, as well as ultimate return, is a question to be considered.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, in the very interesting statement of the Senator from Delaware this morning I did not gather from him how much the United States would need to pay its matured obligations during the next six months. I find by referring to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury that there is redeemable a certain amount in excess of $600,000,000 on the 30th of June, 1881, and on the 1st of May, 1881, but I find nowhere a statement of the amount of money we are compelled to raise in order to meet obligations that will then mature, and I would like for the purpose of information to know exactly what the condition of our accounts is, and what it is necessary to have in hand on the 30th of June to meet matured obligations.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator will turn to page 10 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury he will find the figures. I stated them in the opening of the remarks I addressed to the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator stated how much was redeemable but not how much was payable. What I desire to know is, how much money we must have in hand on the 30th of June to meet matured obligations of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand the Senator wants to know how much is absolutely due.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir. Obligations, I mean, that would otherwise be dishonored.

Mr. BAYARD. The statement is this:

Loan of February, 1861, 6 per cent., payable December 31, 1880, $13,414,000.

That, I understand, has been paid out of the accruing revenues. There then is what is termed the Oregon war debt due the 1st day of July, 1881, of $710,500. Then come the debts which are redeemable at the option of the Government and not compulsorily payable, which are the debts we now have under consideration, amounting to about six hundred and thirty-six million dollars.

Mr. INGALLS. Then the only amount which is due and payable within the next current year is about seven hundred and ten thousand dollars?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, that is all of it I think.

Mr. INGALLS. And when is the $600,000,000 due?

Mr. BAYARD. I shall have to look back to find the date of the various acts to see when they are compulsorily payable.

Mr. INGALLS. It is a very important fact for us to have in hand to know when this sum is due.

Mr. BAYARD. The public debt statement will show the history of that. All we are considering in this bill is not whether we have to pay this money before the 1st of July, but whether if we have the opportunity to fund at a lower rate of interest, it is or is not advisable for that purpose. I will send the Senator the dates of the absolute maturity of all these loans. The table I suppose will be in the ordinary statement of the public debt. I shall have to go back to examine the statutes to find the option.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the debts are merely payable, that is the Government has the option in July to pay them, but there is no compulsion, and we can keep them out as long as we choose. In the bonds themselves it is not compulsory on the Government to pay them at all; it is merely optional with the Government in May and July next on these particular bonds.

Mr. BAYARD. I will say to the honorable Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] that the funding act of 1870 shows the date of the absolute maturity of the bonds that we propose under our option to redeem now.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, the question now under consideration is the question of the rate of interest which the Government will pay on its funded debt; and that question is of significance in two ways: First, as affecting directly the Treasury of the United States in regard to the amount of the interest, and, second, as affecting the rate of interest which the people of the United States shall pay upon obligations assumed in their ordinary business transactions. If I approached the consideration of this question with reference only to the rate of interest the Government shall pay, I would doubt the advisability of any funding law at all. As has been developed in the colloquy which ensued between my colleague and the Senator from Delaware, the Government of the United States does not owe any money which is payable during the next year or during any period of time within ten years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Or any period at all under the funding acts.

Mr. PLUMB. In other words, the Government has got the option of carrying the debt now outstanding as long as it chooses at the current rates, and it has the right to pay it at any time it chooses after the 1st day of next July. During the years that have elapsed since the war closed the Government has paid at the rate of about sixty million dollars a year of the public debt. During the flush times that immediately followed the war, and during the hard times of 1873, and following all the way through, it has paid this yearly average.

The amount of the debt drawing 5 and 6 per cent. interest, respectively, now outstanding, and which the Government has the option of paying this year, is stated by the Senator from Delaware at $637,000,000. We have in the Treasury of the United States at least $100,000,000 which we can properly and safely apply toward the discharge of that debt. We shall have between now and the time when the Government has the right to exercise its option at least $50,000,000 of excess of revenue that can be applied in the same way. If we are going to fund the debt, we need not provide for more than $500,000,000 by the issue of new securities to take the place of those two classes of bonds.

If the amount outstanding after these payments are made is equal with respect to the different classes, that is to say, if there are $250,000,000 of 5 per cent. bonds and $250,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds, the average rate of interest that the Government would continue to pay would be 5½ per cent., and if it continued to pay off the debt at the usual average it could discharge the whole $500,000,000 in eight years, making the average rate of interest for that time not over 2¾ per cent. Therefore the Government can make money in the sense of saving in the payment of interest by paying every year the amount of money which it has heretofore been paying in the discharge of the public debt, and not funding it at all. Besides the ability of the country to pay now is much above the average of the last sixteen years, and during the next ten years we should pay off the debt at the rate of $100,000,000 per annum. This, with the payment which can be made out of cash idle and unnecessary in the Treasury, would discharge the whole of the debt now under consideration in six years at the outside.

As I said, if I were to look at the question from the stand-point of the public Treasury alone, I would say no funding whatever; and I do not understand that there is any question of honor or dishonor involved in the proposition at all. The Government reserved to itself an option, but it did not obligate itself to exercise it. The persons who hold these securities will be glad to continue to hold them until such time as the Government is willing and able to pay them. But I am in favor of paying this debt if the means can be provided at a proper rate of interest, because I desire to establish as far as the Government can do it a low rate of interest for the purpose of the effect it will have on the rate of interest to be paid between private individuals in their business transactions.

The question of the rate of interest to be paid in a given transaction may be of little account. If a man is going to buy a piece of property which he can turn off at a large profit within a short period of time, any rate of interest which leaves him a profit he may be able and willing to pay; but the great mass of the people of the United States who borrow money at a rate of interest which bears hard upon them are the farmers. Their interest accumulates every day in the year, their business is done upon the smallest possible margin, it is subject to many contingencies that do not apply to any other business, and everything which tends to lower the rate of interest upon farm mortgages is a matter of very great public interest and of great public benefit.

So far, then, as this question may be said to relate to the question of the rate of interest to be paid by the people at large, and especially on long mortgage loans, I would be in favor of funding, provided we could hit upon a rate of interest which would be low enough and still accomplish the purpose.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him whether he has seen the report of the interview of the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Secretary of the Treasury, wherein all the argument the Senator is now making about the saving by funding and allowing it to run and paying $100,000,000 a year is answered, I think, very satisfactorily? Has his attention been called to that?

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator desires, I will yield to have him read it.

Mr. BECK. I merely desired to send it over to the Senator so that he might look at it.

Mr. PLUMB. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Now we come to the question as to whether we can negotiate a loan at 3 per cent. As the Senator from New Jersey said, it seems a little remarkable after the talk about the relative value of a long and short loan to find the committee recommending a bill which fixes the rate on the long loan at 3½ per cent. absolutely, while on the short loan it is provided that the rate shall not exceed 3½ per cent.; evidently an intimation that we may get off the short loan at a lower rate of interest than 3½ per cent.

As I before said, we shall not need to fund over $500,000,000 in order to provide fully for all the debt which we have the option to pay during the present year. We shall therefore pay off $650,000,000 by the use of surplus funds on hand and the issue of $500,000,000 new securities. The money now invested in Government bonds will naturally seek reinvestment in the same direction; and besides there is a constant accumulation of funds seeking that form of investment. Men do not take a Government bond so much because of the rate of interest as because it combines the elements of safety and convertibility which can be found in no other security. I believe that we can to-day float a Government loan under all the circumstances at one-half per cent. less than the government of Great Britain can. And why? Not because capital is less remunerative in this country than in Great Britain, as a rule, but because ours is the only Government in the world which is cutting down its debt; it is the only Government in the world whose income is steadily increasing; it is the only Government in the world whose resources are constantly and largely increasing.

When a man gets a large sum of money, very much of his concern then is to take care of it, to make it safe. It is a question with him not as to how high a rate of interest he can get on it, but as to how he can best keep safely what he has already acquired. There is no kind of security which approaches in these elements of security and convertibility the Government bond, and the amount of money which is obliged to be invested in Government bonds in order to meet the conditions I have named is beginning to outrun the opportunity for such investment.

Something has been said about the rates the Government bonds now bear. My figures differ from those of the Senator from Delaware. If the premium on the four percents is 14 per cent., as it has been within the last few days, then the loss of the premium alone during the twenty-six years the bond has to run is over one-half per cent. per annum. Then you have the interest on the premium, and that cuts it down to 3 per cent. or perhaps a little under 3 per cent. So that now the 4 per cent. bonds of the Government at current prices are only yielding their holders the rate of interest proposed by the House bill.

When the 4 per cent. bonds were about to be issued, the question was widely discussed as to whether a bond bearing so low a rate of interest would float at par. I think then the sentiment of men who were supposed to be posted, including the Secretary of the Treasury, was as emphatically expressed to the effect that the 4 per cent. bonds could not be sold at par as the sentiment is now expressed that a 3 per cent. bond cannot be sold at par. Rates of interest were as high in proportion then as now, and the discussion proceeded upon the basis of that rate as it does now, and also, as now, upon the expression by capitalists that the loan could not be floated; but it did float easily and is now at a great premium, and the experience of that time will be repeated if opportunity is given. It will again be found not to be so much a question of what investors are willing to take as to what the Government will pay. This determination by the Government as to what it would pay was then potential, because it offered the only kind of security which answered a certain purpose, and the determination of the Government now to pay but 3 per cent. will prove equally conclusive, for the debt has meanwhile diminished, while the money necessarily seeking that kind of investment has largely increased.

The conditions here are different from those existing elsewhere. The debts of all other countries are increasing, at least none are considerably diminishing. The opportunities for investment in the obligations of other governments are not diminished; they are the same from day to day; they do not need to be sought after to be had. A man in London, or in the financial centers of the continent, does not hesitate to sell a government obligation if present opportunity exists for a more favorable investment, even if temporary in character, for he knows that he can buy back the bonds so sold next day or next month; he knows they will not have been paid off; and besides they bear such a proportion to the active capital of the countries issuing them that they cannot much enhance in price within short periods of time. There is no parallel in the financial history of any nation to the increase of United States securities during the past two years. This is not due to the fact that the Government is better able to pay, but because the debt has been rapidly diminished. At the rate we are now paying off, in twenty years there will not be one dollar of the debt left. Therefore the man who hereafter sells a Government bond will calculate in fixing the price upon the possibility of his not being able to buy another, and especially on the enhanced price he will have to pay to replace it on account of the rapid disappearance of the debt.

It is a debt which was $3,000,000,000 a short time ago; it is nearly half less now; and by the 1st of July next it will be $150,000,000 less than it is to-day. Consequently the area, so to speak, of investments of this kind is constantly shrinking, while the money that is seeking investment of this kind is as constantly increasing. Men say they will not do so and so. Very well; the Government does not need to have them do so and so. It can say as it did in regard to the four percents: "Three per cent. is all we can afford to pay; if you cannot afford to take it, then take the premium off the bonds you now hold, because we are going to take them up just as fast as we can realize the money out of the revenues of the Government to do it," and with that sort of option before the capitalists of this country they will take these bonds. The people of the United States mean to pay off this debt, steadily but rapidly, so as not to have their financial interests disturbed by its existence, and if there is higgling about the rate of interest taxes can readily be imposed in new quarters, which will speedily dispose of the question of principal and interest both at the same time.

The certificates that are mentioned here furnish a class of securities—if I may call them such—that I would be glad for some purposes to have issued. With $500,000,000 as the debt to be paid, I do not think the Government will ever need to issue more than $250,000,000 of 3 per cent. bonds or bonds bearing any other rate of interest. If it will issue $250,000,000 of these certificates, every contractor who deals with the Government, every man who sits on this floor, every man to whom the Government owes an obligation, would be glad to take them in discharge of that obligation, and he would pay them out as the 7.30 notes were paid out, as the 3 per cent. certificates were paid out at a later period. They would go into the hands of the grocer, the baker, the butcher, and merchants generally, and by the time they have got around to the banks for deposit, at the end of thirty or sixty days, they will have an appreciable amount of interest due on them; and I think I know enough about banking to know that when a banker finds an obligation of that kind floating around, with accumulated interest on it, he does not pay it out again, he puts it in his vault because of the profit there is in the transaction. Two hundred and fifty million dollars of these certificates would float in that way and perform the office of currency while in circulation, and when they once take up their lodging-place they will never leave it until the Government calls them in for redemption; they will market themselves without commission.

The men who hold the $637,000,000 bonds outstanding and which it is proposed to redeem want something in their place, and they want a Government obligation. It is not credible that if you take up half of them, if we only issue bonds to the amount of half or less than half this amount, those holders will not take them at any rate of interest we are willing to give. They have their money invested in Government bonds as a matter of security, and they will not wholly change the form and amount of their investment if they can avoid it.

As I said before, the great consideration in all this question is the fact that whatever rate the Government pays the private rates accommodate themselves to. A 3 per cent. Government rate means 5 per cent. on bond and mortgage east of the Mississippi and a maximum rate of 6 per cent. west of that stream. There is one great interest in this country which has not yet felt what is called the "business boom," and that is the real estate interest, and especially the real estate interest of that great section of the country west of the Alleghany Mountains. A low rate of interest means higher prices for land; it means practically higher prices for the products of the land; it means safer times and better times for the men who cultivate the land; and in their interest, if there was no other interest at stake, we ought to fix this rate of interest as low as it possibly can be fixed, in order that they may benefit and not burden from our action.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, we have $637,000,000 that we can fund bearing 5 and 6 per cent. interest. The question for us to determine, and it was one that the Finance Committee took into consideration, is what is the best rate at which we can float a bond. The majority of the committee settled upon a 3½ per cent. bond. It was not a unanimous report; some of us differed. The whole question for us to determine is whether we can with the credit of the Government float a 3 per cent. bond. If we can we ought to do it; there ought not to be any hesitancy about our attempt to do it. The two classes of securities provided for by the bill are, first, the Treasury notes, running from one to ten years at a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent. These notes will be paid, it is to be presumed, under the direction of the Treasury in ten annual installments. Then we have the requirements of the sinking fund in addition.

Mr. BAYARD. May I state to my friend a correction? I understand that any of those bonds may be payable at the end of five years. The Treasury notes may be payable at the end of a single year or in ten years at the option of the Government.

Mr. WALLACE. That only makes it that much the better. We have $300,000,000 of notes, then, that we may take up in the first year. We have a large amount of pensions to pay, and we have the requirements of the sinking fund to comply with. It seems to me the first mistake we make is in providing for the redemption of these bonds in five years. What we want to do is to commence at the end of ten years, having an abundance of our obligations to redeem during those ten years in the form of the certificates, in the form of the requirements of the sinking fund, and we should commence to redeem at the end of ten years. If we make the bond redeemable beginning at the end of ten years and payable at the end of forty years, no man on the floor of the Senate would doubt that such a bond would float at 3 per cent.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Why not make them payable at the end of thirty years?

Mr. WALLACE. It is possible to make them payable at the end of thirty years, but to be certain of it my view of the case is that we ought to make this a 3 per cent. loan redeemable at ten years and payable at the end of forty years, certainly not longer than forty years. I am as anxious to get rid of this indebtedness as any man on the floor of the Senate or as any citizen can be; but why shall we deprive ourselves of the advantage of a long option of ten years when we have abundance of obligations that mature pending the ten years in the form of the Treasury notes and in the form of the requirements of the sinking fund? I cannot for my life understand why we should deprive ourselves of that option. Hence I was in favor of the idea, as I am now, that a 3 per cent. bond redeemable at ten years and payable at the end of forty years is the security that we ought to make when we issue a bond.

I agree fully with the conservative views of the Senator from Delaware. He is eminently a safe financier, and I agree fully with the view that he takes in regard to what the country should adopt as to its future; but we must measure the credit of this country by what really exists. When you can go into the markets of New York with a Government bond and borrow money at 2½ per cent. on that bond as collateral——

Mr. BAYARD. On call.

Mr. WALLACE. On call, I agree; but when you can go there with that bond and borrow money at that rate of interest, it seems to me it is perfectly safe for us to put into the market a bond bearing 3 per cent. interest running ten years. We do not want our bonds to stand much above par; we want them to stand at par. I agree to no policy that would drive our bonds below par in the market, but these bonds will stand at par and something above it, or I am mistaken, looking at the present and the past.

I simply wished to state my position in regard to the rate of interest and the length of time these bonds were to run. As to the fifth section of the bill, which we shall reach in the future consideration of this measure, I agree fully with the action of the committee. I am for no coercive measures on any money interest in this country. On the contrary, every interest should be free, being entirely at liberty to take any security of the Federal Government that it sees fit to take, and it should not be coerced into the taking of a security. This is the only true policy for us. The credit of the Government is abundantly sufficient to enable us to float our indebtedness at the lowest rate known in the world. It seems to me that on a careful consideration of the situation we can safely take the risk of putting before the country a 3 per cent. loan redeemable in ten years and payable after forty.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Finance. I have attended its deliberations, and as a member of that committee I listened as carefully as I could to all the arguments made on all sides of this question, and I confess that I had a good deal of difficulty in determining as to what is best. There is a very large class of men in the country, men very influential, who are now the holders of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds of the Government, that do not want us to pass a funding bill at all, because if they can only postpone for a year the passing of any funding bill, they will draw out of the Treasury of the United States over $12,000,000 in the shape of interest, more even than would be taken out of the Treasury by funding the debt at 3½ per cent. Of course whatever pretenses they make they do not want to lose that $12,000,000 for the next year. They are supported also by a number of men associated together as national bankers, who are afraid that they are about to be compelled to take 3 per cent. bonds, and they will endeavor to make a 3 per cent. bond a failure.

I have no doubt that persons came before us telling us that there was no doubt of a 3 per cent. bond being able to be carried and saying that it could be done and they knew it could be done, when they hoped that we should put it at that rate in order that they could make it a failure and take $12,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States before Congress should meet again.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. A million dollars a month?

Mr. BECK. A million a month. I have no doubt about that. At the same time, while I was apprehensive in that regard, I was almost persuaded by other gentlemen who I believed in good faith were representing the facts to us that we could float a 3 per cent. bond. There is just where we had the difficulty, and I desire to state frankly both sides of it. They argued with us and they showed us that the present 4 per cent. bond of the United States, with a high premium, is now paying a rate of 3½ per cent. on the market value, which was the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. VEST. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. BECK. The Secretary of the Treasury called it 3½ per cent., and Mr. Hatch, of New York, called it 3¼ per cent., and nobody except the Senator from Missouri has told us differently from that. We had the statements of these gentlemen before us. This is a note appended to one of the tables submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury:

NOTE.—The rate of interest realized to investors in the 4 per cent. bonds, at present prices, on the assumption that the bonds will be paid as soon as redeemable, is 3¼ per cent. per annum.

Mr. VEST. What was the rate in New York then?

Mr. BECK. One hundred and thirteen; about the same as it is now. The Secretary himself advised us that we could float certainly a considerable portion of Treasury notes at 3 per cent. Therefore I did not feel willing to go above 3 per cent. when we were advised by the Secretary that we could float at least a large portion of the Treasury notes at 3 per cent., and when I saw that the four percents now were at such a premium that the income from them was down to 3½ or 3¼ per cent.

Mr. McPHERSON. What use could the Secretary expect to make of Treasury notes that he could not make of the bonds?

Mr. BECK. They can be used in a variety of ways in which bonds cannot be used. Executors, administrators, trustees, men who want to make investments for six or eight months, short loans, call loans, look for a short note such as the Treasury note proposed, which is far better for all these purposes than a bond which can be called for in five years.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the Senator state why?

Mr. BECK. Because you can demand the money at once instead of letting it lie in the bank and getting nothing for it, and it draws 3 per cent.

Mr. HEREFORD. The bond bearing 3½ per cent. would answer the same purpose.

Mr. BECK. You take your chances in the market for selling your bond. It may be up or down, and you cannot control it, and you run the risk of the fluctuation. It is obvious, I suppose, to every gentleman in the Senate that the short bond, or delivery bond, is better than any other up to the amount to which it can be used. It was suggested by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] and by my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] that these notes should be perhaps receivable for customs dues, and other gentlemen seem to think they can be so used. That is a mistake. We cannot receive anything for customs dues that we cannot pay out again as legal-tender, because the money that we take in at the custom-house has to be used to pay off the current expenses of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My colleague misunderstood me about the Treasury certificates. I said that if greenbacks had been made receivable for customs they would have been at par long before they were.

Mr. BECK. My colleague is right in that; but these certificates can only be used as a short loan, and they will therefore be valuable as such.

It has been said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE,] my colleague on the committee, that we have ample use for all the bonds that we have got, and that we have no use for any of these bonds for ten years. That is a mistake. Senators must not forget that we have of the bonds of the United States now $730,000,000 of four percents that run until 1907. That cannot be changed. We have no right to pay one of them before 1907. These bonds furnish amply all the banks want now or ever will want, if they see fit to buy them and hold them.

Mr. HEREFORD. They have got to pay a premium for them, though.

Mr. BECK. But they have them in their hands now, and the Senator will observe that they would rather pay that premium than take a bond at 3 per cent., perhaps. They have got in their hands now $150,000,000 of these bonds, and they have now of fives and sixes $212,000,000, and would they not prefer to hold on to these fives and sixes for another year, drawing 6 per cent. and 5 per cent. interest upon them, rather than take a 3 per cent. bond?

Mr. HEREFORD. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, has he forgotten that in 1907, according to the rate of increase in our population, we shall have a population of 90,000,000 people? Business will increase; it will not go back.

Mr. BECK. I do not know how large a population we shall have then. We have 50,000,000 now. Then we have falling due in 1891, ten years from now, $250,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds. We have for the next ten years at least a thousand million dollars of other bonds than those we are now seeking to convert, nearly seven hundred and fifty million dollars of 4 per cent. bonds and $250,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds; so that no bank is dependent upon any bonds we are now about to issue to carry on business. Therefore that may as well be dismissed from the calculation.

Then the question is, why should we suspend, as the Senator from New Jersey desires, as the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Connecticut desire, the right to buy any of these bonds for ten years? because that is the proposition now. If we have any surplus revenue to use in that way we should have to go into the market to buy the bonds at any premium that the holders could make us pay for them until we have a right to take them in.

Mr. McPHERSON. We ought not to have any surplus revenue.

Mr. BECK. The moment you talk about taking off the duty on silks or pottery or anything New Jersey produces, a howl is raised. You cannot get rid of the question in any way except to pay the national debt, and then the taxes will come down. We now have to pay a tax of 60 per cent. on raw silk to build up two or three silk manufactories. I want to pay the debt so that there will be no necessity for that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to call my colleague's attention to a portion of the fifth section of the bill, which provides that—

From and after the 1st day of May, 1881, the 3 per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation.

That is a provision of this bill.

Mr. BECK. My colleague must understand that all the bonds they have now or all the bonds they see fit to buy they will hold in spite of this bill. They are not required to give us any bond they may hold.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But if the bill passes as it came from the House, will not these bonds be the basis of their circulation?

Mr. BECK. All that is held by the Treasury and now forms a part of the securities for our national-bank circulation will still remain. There are to be no more new bonds issued after that time except the 3 per cent. bonds if that feature of the bill goes into force. That is the trouble there.

The bill provides, you will observe, for the issue of $700,000,000 of bonds and certificates. We have $637,000,000 of bonds to be refunded, but we have to take $19,000,000 of surplus revenue, or about that, for arrears of pension, and therefore it is safe to call it $650,000,000. I do not quite agree that we should issue $400,000,000 of bonds, because we can thus only issue $250,000,000 of certificates, assuming $650,000,000 to be the total amount. The whole amount of indebtedness to be provided for being $650,000,000, the proposition is, in order to make it successful, to authorize the issue of $700,000,000 and to fix the number of bonds at $400,000,000, and therefore we reduce the certificates down to $250,000,000, making $650,000,000 the total of all.

It is proposed to make no bond payable for ten years. What then have we on hand to which we can apply our surplus revenue to reduce our debt? Two hundred and fifty million dollars Treasury certificates only, while during the last fiscal year our surplus was $62,000,000. Gentlemen now say it will be $100,000,000 hereafter. If it does not increase, but remains at $60,000,000, in four years that $60,000,000 of surplus would pay off every dollar of these Treasury certificates, and during the six years that remain before the bonds fall due, if you make them ten-forties, or ten-twenties, or ten anythings, you will have to go into the market and buy whatever bonds you can buy at any price anybody may ask or extort from you, or you must keep the money idle in the Treasury. Should the Government of the United States put itself in that position? It is not good policy, I think, in a man to put his debt in such a shape that he cannot pay it off when he has the money to pay it off; so that he has to go into the market to buy it at whatever price the man sees fit to charge him for it. So of a government. As we have a surplus revenue, as there will be only $250,000,000 in the form of Treasury notes or certificates when the bill passes, and that is all that we can pay off with our surplus revenue, why should we extend it beyond five years in buying up bonds or in having occasion to mature them after the expiration of ten years? That is wherein I differ from the Senator from Pennsylvania. In ten years from this time there will be $250,000,000 of four-and-a-half percents maturing; for such we have to provide. Surely it is more important for us to reduce the interest on them or pay them off, as we have the right to pay them, in 1891, as they are bearing 4½ interest, than these bonds we are about to issue, whether they bear 3 per cent. or 3½ per cent.; and as we have $250,000,000 maturing then bearing 4½ per cent., ought we not to be in a position now to look to paying them off and saving the 4½ per cent. on that $250,000,000?

I do not believe in the coercive clause in the fifth section. I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania that we ought not to have any debt issued that we coerce anybody to take; but I believe, if we are looking to economy and if there is any doubt that we shall be able to float a 3 per cent. bond, we can make it absolutely certain in this way, not by requiring the national banks to take no other bond and forcing them to take this to increase their business, but by making a provision that all banks which see fit to take the 3 per cent. bonds and deposit them as security for their circulation shall have that circulation at a taxation of one-half of 1 per cent. instead of 1 per cent., as they are now paying. That would be a sufficient inducement to all new banks and to many of the present banks to buy these 3 per cent. bonds and hold them as security for their circulation by giving them the benefit of having only a tax of one-half of 1 per cent. to pay upon the circulation based upon the issue of 3 per cent. bonds instead of 1 per cent., as they are now paying. You will thereby make it absolutely certain. What would be the effect of that? The difference between 3 and 3½ per cent. on $650,000,000 is $3,250,000 a year. If $300,000,000 bank circulation be secured by a deposit of 3 per cent. bonds, and we surrender the one-half of 1 per cent., that is a million and a half that we surrender, and we have the difference between a million and a half thus surrendered and the three millions and a quarter, the difference between 3 per cent. and 3½ per cent., which would be a million and three-quarters every year in our pocket, and we should have an absolute security that the 3 per cent. loan would be taken by giving the banks the benefit of the one-half of 1 per cent. on their circulation if they take the three percents. There is no coercion in that.

Mr. McPHERSON. You propose to bribe them to take it?

Mr. BECK. You bribe them no more than you do when you say that the bonds last issued shall be first called in. In order to induce men to take the bonds quickly you allow the bonds first taken to run last. Is that bribing men to take the bonds rapidly? Is it not an inducement to men to take the bonds in a fair and legitimate transaction, and give them fair benefits for thus enabling you to save as you will at 3 per cent. a year $15,000,000, enough money in the present condition of affairs to pay the Navy of the United States, over whose destiny the Senator from New Jersey presides so ably. I believe we appropriate less than that for the Navy of the United States. The difference saved is $15,339,000, according to the calculation made by the clerk of the committee. Why should we not, if there is any trouble about it, give to the banking corporations who take the 3 per cent. bonds a reduction of one-half of 1 per cent. or the tax upon the circulation based upon them, so as to make it an absolute certainty, and by so doing save $15,000,000 a year over the present system?

Mr. EATON. How much do you lose in taxation?

Mr. BECK. A million and a half on the $300,000,000 of paper issued, on them; and the difference between 3 and 3½ per cent. is, as I said, $3,250,000, or a saving of $1,750,000 by a 3 per cent. bond over a 3½ per cent. with this provision. I am looking to see how we can surely fund this debt. Nothing is so bad as to do nothing, and I am for a 3½ per cent. bond., if 3 per cent. will not do. I will have it 3 if it is possible to fund the debt at 3; if it is not possible to fund it at 3 and we can get any aid from the banks by allowing them a rebate or taxing them only one-half of 1 per cent. on circulation if they will help us, I will do that as the next best thing. I am not willing to lose the opportunity of the present favorable condition of things and continue to pay $12,000,000 annually more than need be paid.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just one word of explanation to my colleague. I think he and I misunderstand each other; he is talking about the bill as amended by the committee and I am talking about the bill as it came from the House. I am for the bill as it came from the House, which substitutes the 3 per cent. bonds for the fives and sixes the banks may have. The interest on the fives and sixes is to cease, and therefore the banks will be compelled to take the 3 per cent. bonds or lose instead on those they have. That is my reading of it. This is the bill as passed by the House which comes to the Senate amended by the Finance Committee.

Mr. BECK. My understanding is that the bonds we seek to refund on which interest ceases will not be held by the banks any more. All the fives they now hold will be withdrawn at once; but the fours and four-and-a-halfs that they hold before the 1st of May that are not called in remain in their hands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But look at the fifth section of the House bill:

SEC. 5. From and after the 1st day of May, 1881, the 3 per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation, or as security for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with such banks.

Mr. BECK. After that time, when a new bank seeks a charter, or an old bank an increase of its circulation, the Comptroller of the Currency shall not receive anything but a 3 per cent. bond; but it does not affect any of the existing banks or the existing circulation that before the 1st of May is secured by fours and four-and-a-halfs which were not called in and which have been before this received. That is the construction of it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to put a question to the Senator from Kentucky in connection with his proposition to remit a portion of the tax on circulation. I desire to ask him what inducement there is to individuals to invest in these bonds, if there is to be a discrimination between the moneyed investor of the country and the private investors.

Mr. BECK. There is no inducement held out to the banks to the injury of the private investors. They can hold now fours and four-and-a-halfs. They are holding fives and sixes now, and unless they are refunded they will continue to hold them and draw 5 and 6 per cent. interest. Now in order to make this a success I said that, rather than pay 3½ per cent., if I could get the bonds taken at 3 per cent. I would give circulation to the banks basing it on these bonds at a tax of one-half of 1 per cent. instead of 1 per cent., as at present.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand the Senator from Kentucky to say that he would do that to secure a 3 per cent. instead of a 3½ per cent. bond.

Mr. BECK. I said that only upon that portion of the national-bank circulation which should be secured by the 3 per cent. bonds would I do that; on all the circulation secured by 4, 4½, 5, and 6 per cent. bonds, they should pay the 1 per cent. tax as they now pay it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Kentucky proposes that in case they will withdraw their four-and-a-halfs and fours as security for their currency, and substitute three-and-a-halfs——

Mr. BECK. No; threes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. This portion of the tax on circulation is to be remitted on that account. Then, if they can withdraw the four-and-a-half percents, they will go into the market and sell those bonds at a premium and get the threes.

Mr. BECK. The propositions I am suggesting now for the Senate to think about for what they are worth are merely thrown out as suggestions which I made in committee as to the difficulties I saw in each of the propositions, and the efforts I was endeavoring to make to see how we could successfully refund the debt and do it on the best terms. I shall vote against the rate of 3½ per cent. now, hoping that as we go through the bill we shall make other amendments that will perhaps enable us to fund the bonds at 3. If, however, I cannot get that done, and believe when the arguments all close that the bill will be a failure unless we make the rate 3½ per cent., I shall vote for 3½ rather than have it fail.

There are many other things in connection with this bill that I might refer to. There are questions connected with the fifth section and the restoration of the two sections of the Revised Statutes that the House I think very wisely restored. I shall contend, and I think I shall show good reasons for so contending, that sections 5159 and 5160 ought to be restored, and that the Senate Committee on Finance made a mistake in striking them out, and that the fourth section of the act of 1874, which the committee has restored, ought to be repealed. I hope to show good reasons for that view; but perhaps it is too far in advance now to do it. I only rose for the time being to give a reason why I should vote against the 3½ per cent. rate and for 3 per cent., reserving the right to go back.

Now, one word as to what was said by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] when I called his attention to a statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, when he declared that it would be better not to refund at all than to refund at 3½ per cent., provided we continued to pay off $60,000,000 of principal a year. On that point the facts were all given before the committee in tables, and to show that there is no mistake about it, and in order that it may be looked at in the morning—for I suppose there will not be a final vote on this to-night—I present for insertion in the RECORD an extract from the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury before the committee:

I have another table here which I think would be interesting to you, and it is an answer to some arguments made in the House. I do not know that I am at liberty here to talk of what was done in the House, but I suppose the committee can. Mr. KELLEY, with a good deal of ingenuity, endeavored to show that it was not our interest to refund now, but we should, leaving the 5 or 6 per cent. bonds outstanding, just go on and pay them from the surplus revenue. In order to ascertain whether that was practical or not, I had this computation very carefully made. This shows the amount of interest we would be required to pay on the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds if they were retired at the rate of $50,000,000 per year, and that is what is proposed; and also another column showing the amount of interest to be paid on them if retired at the rate of $100,000,000 a year. It shows that we would pay on 5 and 6 per cent. bonds, if they were not refunded, but redeemed at the rate he proposes of $50,000,000 a year, $232,500,000 in interest. If paid off at the rate of $100,000,000 a year, it would be $125,500,000. If these bonds are refunded at 3½ per cent., and redeemed at the rate of $50,000,000 a year, we would pay $159,250,000 for interest.

Senator VOORHEES. At $50,000,000 a year, commencing five years from now?

Secretary SHERMAN. No, from this time on.

Senator VOORHEES. Please repeat the last statement.

Secretary SHERMAN. I say, if you authorize the 3½ per cent. bond as proposed in case the bill is amended, and apply $50,000,000 annually to redemptions, we would have paid in interest before they are all redeemed $159,250,000, which is about eighty million dollars less than we would pay under Mr. KELLEY's plan. But if we redeem at the rate of $100,000,000 per annum, we would only pay $87,750,000, or about forty million dollars less. I suppose his argument, to state it fairly, would be that we ought not to issue bonds that could not be refunded and paid off at the proper time, and in that I agree with him, but we ought to refund, saving the right to redeem in short periods.

The CHAIRMAN. He has borne in mind nothing but the aggregation of interest. That was his theory.

Secretary SHERMAN. If the bill is passed as it came from the House, and we could by a possibility sell those bonds at par, the amount of interest we would pay at 3 per cent., supposing the redemptions to be made at the rate of $50,000,000 a year, would be $136,500,000, about twenty million dollars of interest less during the whole period than on the scale of 3½ per cent.

Senator KERNAN. You would save $20,000,000 of interest.

Secretary SHERMAN. We might save $20,000,000 of interest at 3 per cent., but at the same time in negotiating your bonds, in the delay and procrastination in the sale of those bonds, we would very probably lose all or more than we might save by the difference. As a matter of course any Secretary would desire to sell bonds at 3 per cent., and I think some certificates can be sold at that rate, but it may be a serious matter if we fail in this negotiation and have to go back to Congress for power to refund at a higher rate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this has been a very interesting and profitable discussion on both sides and has furnished a great deal of food for serious reflection. I think we ought to sleep upon it; but before I move to adjourn, I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up and pass, or reject as they may think it right, a bill for the relief of a widow, which has been reported here for a long time, which involves only $575, which has been reported half a dozen times in the two Houses always favorably, that has been here for years, and this poor woman is now absolutely sustained by the charity of her friends. If this money belongs to her she ought to have it, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent to take up the bill indicated by him. The bill will be read for information.

Mr. BAYARD. That will lay aside this pending bill temporarily.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; I merely ask to have it taken up by unanimous consent, not disturbing anything.

WIDOW OF GEORGE W. FLOOD.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 2094) for the relief of George W. Flood was considered, as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to George W. Flood, for his services as a clerk in the Bureau of Topographical Engineers, from the 1st of December, 1854, to the 16th of September, 1856, at the rate of the compensation or salary of a clerk of the first class, after deducting the amount received by him for services in the office during that period, the sum of $575.50.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend by inserting before the words "George W. Flood" the words "M. J. Flood, widow of." The poor man has died pending the pendency of this bill.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the bill in line 4 by inserting "M. J. Flood, widow of."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the widow of George W. Flood."

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the order to adjourn——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asks the Senator from South Carolina to withdraw his motion, that the Chair may lay before the Senate some House bills for reference.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

The following joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 378) providing for the printing and distribution of the Report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1880; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 386) for printing report of the Life-Saving Service.

The bill (H. R. No. 7033) making the city of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee, a port of delivery was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. No. 4005) to incorporate a society for the protection of children in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 6324) to construe an act entitled "An act to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia, and to clear the title of the trustees of such property;"

A bill (H. R. No. 6659) to authorize the Southern Maryland Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 7031) to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 7032) to amend the act incorporating the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company; and

A bill (H. R. No. 7117) authorizing the Washington and Chesapeake Railroad Company to extend its railroad into and within the District of Columbia.

UNION RAILROAD DEPOT IN WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3047) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to recommend a proper site for a union railroad depot in the city of Washington, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendment disagreed to by the House, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER appointed Mr. WHYTE, Mr. WITHERS, and Mr. ROLLINS, the conferees.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the regular order of business, merely for the purpose of saving the place of the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask whether as we now stand the funding bill is not the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The funding bill is now the unfinished business.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I hope not. I want to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. BAYARD. I will if the Senator will renew it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I wish to offer an amendment in order that it may be printed.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection, provided I do not lose my right.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, and ask that it be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is in these words:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to authorize public subscriptions to be received, at all depositories of the United States, and at all national banks, to the bonds and to the Treasury notes herein provided for, for thirty days before he shall contract for or award any portion of said bonds or Treasury notes to any syndicate of individuals or bankers or otherwise than under such public subscriptions; and if it shall appear that more than the entire amount of such bonds and Treasury notes, or of either of them, has been subscribed within said thirty days, he shall award the full amount subscribed to all persons who shall have made bona fide subscriptions for the sum of —— dollars or less, and the residue ratably among the subscribers in proportion to the amount by them respectively subscribed.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and twenty-one minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 15, 1881.

The House was called to order at eleven o'clock a. m. by Mr. BLACKBURN, Speaker pro tempore.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THOMAS SNELL.

Mr. BOUCK. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his demand for the regular order until I can ask unanimous consent of the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 6479) for the relief of Thomas Snell. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHITE. I will reserve the right to object until the bill has been read so we may know what it is.

Mr. STEVENSON. This was where a judgment was obtained, and this is a bill for the relief of one of the sureties. It is recommended by the judge of the court as well as by the district attorney. Besides, it comes as the report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KEIFER. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; it is a unanimous report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WHITE. I want the bill read and shall reserve my right to object until after it has been read.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to discharging the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill and putting it on its passage at this time?

Mr. WHITE. I object to the bill without knowing more about it than I now do.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. I demand the regular order of business as I want to proceed with the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. ATKINS. If the regular order of business is insisted upon, and it seems to be demanded by several gentlemen, I shall then move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. CALKINS. I rise to a question of the highest privilege.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLYMER. I rise to move a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Army appropriation bill. The Senate have insisted on their amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 6719) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, and have requested a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. I move that request be agreed to, and that one be now appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as the managers of said conference on the part of the House, Mr. CLYMER, Mr. FORNEY, and Mr. HAWLEY.

UNION RAILROAD DEPOT, WASHINGTON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as the managers of the conference on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3047) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to recommend a proper site for a union railroad depot in the city of Washington, and for other purposes, Mr. MILLER, Mr. HUNTON, and Mr. HAZELTON.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CABELL. I hope there will be no objection to my presenting a resolution for reference to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Tennessee demands the regular order of business.

Mr. ATKINS. No, I did not demand it, but as several gentlemen did demand the regular order of business I have moved to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, I demanded the regular order of business.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the gentleman will hear me for one moment.

Mr. REAGAN. If I yield to one I must yield to all the others who wish to introduce propositions.

GRANT OF LANDS FOR UNIVERSITY PURPOSES.

Mr. CONVERSE. I rise to a question of the highest privilege, and present a conference report which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The undersigned, conferees on the part of the Senate of the United States and on the part of the House of Representatives, with regard to the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1327) entitled "An act to grant lands to Dakota, Montana, Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming for university purposes," have conferred in respect to said disagreeing votes, and have agreed and recommended that the House do agree to said amendments to said bill, and each of them, and that upon such agreement said bill do pass.

GEORGE L. CONVERSE,
P. DUNN,
Managers on the part of the House.
J. E. MCDONALD,
J. D. WALKER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CONVERSE. The amendment to the bill simply provides that the proceeds of the sales shall not be used by these Territories until they have been admitted as States. The committee thought it a proper amendment to be made, and have concurred in its adoption. I move the report be adopted.

The conference report was adopted.

Mr. CONVERSE move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DUTIES ON MANUFACTURES OF IRON, ETC.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCKINLEY,] who is one of the committee of the House to attend the funeral of FERNANDO WOOD, and he has to leave the city, and merely asks to submit a report from the Committee on Ways and Means for reference and printing.

Mr. MCKINLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7201) in relation to the duties on manufactures of iron, &c.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARLISLE. The minority of the committee ask the right to present their views hereafter, and that they also may be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

W. J. SPICER.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 401) in relation to the barge W. J. Spicer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

A. W. C. NOWLIN.

Mr. CABELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund to A. W. C. Nowlin, late Assistant Postmaster of the House, a sum equal to the difference between the pay of Postmaster and that of Assistant Postmaster of the House for the period of time between the 7th of October, 1880, when the late Postmaster died, and the 14th of December, 1880, when A. W. C. Nowlin was elected Postmaster of the House, he having acted in that capacity for the time mentioned.

PHILADELPHIA AND READING RAILROAD COMPANY TAXES.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7202) to release the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company from the payment of certain taxes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—M'CABE VS. ORTH.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Elections. I am authorized to submit the resolution and report which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask immediate action upon the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the matter of the contested-election case of McCabe vs. Orth in the ninth Indiana district:

Resolved, That the contestant, James McCabe, contesting the right of Hon. Godlove S. Orth, from the ninth congressional district of Indiana, to a seat in the Forty-sixth Congress, have leave to withdraw his papers in said contest, and that Hon. Godlove S. Orth's title to his seat in the said Congress be, and the same is hereby, confirmed.

Mr. CALKINS. This is a unanimous report from the Committee on Elections, and I move its adoption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman to state that this is a unanimous report from the committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has so stated.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FINLEY and others demanded the regular order.

Mr. WILSON. I hope gentlemen will yield to me for a moment to make a motion in reference to a matter which is of great public importance, and should be considered at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being demanded, the Chair has no option but to recognize it. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This requires a two-thirds vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 126, noes 32.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the morning hour was dispensed with.

TAX ON WEISS BEER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the call of States for the consideration of bills by consent will be proceeded with. The call rests with the State of New Jersey, the unfinished business being the consideration of the bill called up by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. BLAKE,] and which was not completed at the conclusion of the morning hour on Saturday.

Mr. BLAKE. I now call up again, Mr. Speaker, for consideration the bill which was pending at the close of the morning hour on Saturday, and which had been read; the morning hour having closed while the Clerk was proceeding to read the amendments proposed thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill which was pending as stated.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 6983) to regulate the collection of the tax on weiss beer.

Mr. BLAKE. This bill was printed in the RECORD of Saturday's proceedings. I now ask that the Clerk read the amendments proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 7, line 13, after the word "boxes," strike out the words, "in addition to the other brands now required by law upon packages containing fermented liquors, shall be branded upon the side in letters not less than one inch in length with the words weiss beer" and insert "shall be branded upon the side in letters not less than one inch in length, with the name of the brewer who filled them, and the place of manufacture, and also with the words 'weiss beer;' and the bottles shall have the name of the brewer who filled them blown in or otherwise stamped or marked upon them; and any brewer who shall sell or remove for consumption or sale, and any dealer who shall receive for sale, or sell, boxes or bottles not branded or marked as herein required shall be liable to a penalty of $20 for each box and of $1 for each bottle, so sold or removed for consumption or sale, or received for sale, or sold."

Mr. BLAKE. I accept the amendment suggested and demand the previous question upon the bill and amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New Jersey that the amendment will have to be voted upon.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand that; but I am simply stating that there is no objection to the amendment as far as I am concerned.

Mr. CARLISLE. Before that amendment of the committee is submitted to be voted upon, I desire to make a short statement and call the attention of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means to it. It will be observed that the amendment as reported by the committee requires the name of the brewer or manufacturer of weiss beer to be blown in the bottle. I am inclined to think, in fact I am satisfied, upon reflection since the bill was reported, that this provision ought to be stricken out. The necessary effect of the clause will be to compel all the manufacturers to lose their present stock of bottles, which will fall heavily upon and do great injustice to the small manufacturers engaged in brewing this character of beer. I suggest, therefore, that the amendment be so modified as to strike out from line 20, in section 1, the words "and the bottles shall have the name of the brewer who filled them blown in or otherwise stamped or marked upon them;" and from line 24 the words "or bottles." That is satisfactory, I am informed, to the gentleman from New Jersey in charge of the bill, and I think is a matter of simple justice to manufacturers engaged in the business who have a stock of bottles now on hand.

Mr. BLAKE. I accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in section 1, line 20, the words "and the bottles shall have the name of the brewer who filled them blown in or otherwise stamped or marked upon them;" and in line 24 to strike out the words "or bottles."

Mr. COX. I desire to say that that amendment is entirely acceptable to those who are engaged in the business. I have communications from several persons engaged in the business stating that this will meet their views.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on this amendment under the pending order of business in which the House is engaged during this hour, more for the purpose of having it decided than from any other motive. Under this rule, by which bills are presented in this hour by consent, a member is authorized to present any bill, and the bill shall be considered unless there be five objections thereto. Now, a member may offer a bill to which there is no objection whatever, and thereafter there can be no objection offered, for the bill is placed in such a position under the rule that the objections then made will not prevail against its consideration. But as now proposed here, a bill which in the form as originally presented may be unobjectionable may be so amended in the House and by a majority vote as to make it entirely objectionable by the incorporation of provisions or amendments which will enlarge its nature or change its entire scope and place it in the power of the majority of the House to pass it when it would not be entertained under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has the rule in his hand, and does not see that the objection made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] attaches. It simply requires that an opportunity shall be afforded for objection to the consideration of the bill. That having been done, and five members not having objected, the bill is clearly before the House and subject to amendment as any other measure at any other time. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL.]

Mr. CARLISLE. Before the amendment the gentleman from Tennessee proposes can be received or voted upon, the House must first dispose of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means. My amendment is an amendment to the one proposed by that committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky is first in order, as it is an amendment to the amendment coming from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BLAKE. I accept that amendment and call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey calls for the previous question on the pending amendment.

Mr. COX. Is the pending amendment that offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE?]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky has been agreed to, and the amendment now pending is that offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL,] and upon that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BLAKE] demands the previous question.

Mr. BLAKE. The Chair has misunderstood me. I have not accepted the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. I accepted the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from New Jersey has not accepted the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. Does the gentleman from New Jersey demand the previous question?

Mr. BLAKE. I did demand the previous question.

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to know if the objections for which the rule provides have been called for as to this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot answer of his own knowledge; for this bill came over as unfinished business from Saturday. The Chair takes it for granted the bill would not have been under consideration under the rule except properly after an opportunity of objection by five members had been offered.

Mr. McMILLIN. My recollection is it had not reached that stage. The first thing we entered upon this morning in connection with this bill was the reading of it, which precedes the opportunity for objections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair the gentleman from Tennessee is correct; that the morning hour on Saturday expired while the bill called up by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BLAKE] was being read, and that objections had not been called for. Such is the information given by the Clerk; so that the Chair has no hesitation in saying that the opportunity for objections still belongs to the House. The Chair will now ask whether there be objection to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the bill is to be put under the operation of the previous question so as to cut off the amendment of my colleague [Mr. DIBRELL]——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is not a matter of debate. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair does not count five gentlemen rising to object. The bill is before the House, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. WARNER. Let that amendment be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That from and after the 1st day of July, 1881, the tax on brandy distilled from fruit shall be fifty cents per gallon, to be assessed and collected as now provided by law.

Mr. BLAKE. I make the point of order on that amendment that I had demanded the previous question before the amendment was offered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman was not entitled to demand the previous question until after opportunity for objection had been given; and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee is in possession of the House.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. It is whether any bill affecting the revenues must not have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair holds the gentleman from Missouri is correct in the statement he makes; but his point of order comes too late. The bill is in possession of the House and in process of consideration, and it is too late to make that point of order.

Mr. BLAKE. I make the further point of order that another bill is now pending before the House containing a similar provision or identically the same provision. I cannot give the object of the bill, but I am so advised by members of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DIBRELL. If there is any such bill I demand its production. I have never seen or heard of it and I deny its existence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot entertain the point of order unless information is furnished showing that there is such a bill pending substantially the same as the amendment now offered.

Mr. BLAKE. It is identically the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ask the gentleman to furnish the bill which he says contains the substance of the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point that the proceedings of the House must go on; that they cannot wait upon the gentleman from New Jersey. There can be no interruption in the proceedings of the House. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLAKE. I call on the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] to verify the statement I have made.

Mr. CARLISLE. What was the statement?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no information as to bills pending in the Committee on Ways and Means. Nor can the Chair sustain the point of order unless that information be furnished for lack of which the Chair must necessarily overrule the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BLAKE. The point of order that I made against the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] was that there is now pending before this House a bill containing the same or substantially the same provision. The Chair called upon me to produce the bill or state the number of it, which I am unable to do. I call now upon the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, to verify my assertion that there is pending at this time before that committee a bill containing the same or substantially the same provision as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must say to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BLAKE] that he does not recognize any right to accept any statement upon general information. The Chair has decided and overruled the point of order made by the gentleman, and has given as his reason for so doing that he has no information of which he can take cognizance that there is a bill pending before the House substantially the same as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the tax on salt be reduced to one cent per ton.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make another point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. My point is that the subject-matter of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] is not germane to the subject-matter of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the point of order comes too late.

Mr. CONGER. I rose in my place and stood ready to make it while the Chair was deciding another point of order. There must be an opportunity to submit points of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks full opportunity was furnished.

Mr. CONGER. But it was only just this moment that the amendment was again read so I could hear it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that he is not prepared to say that he would not have sustained his point of order, and ruled the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee out of order as not being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, if it had been made in time.

Mr. CONGER. Then I call upon the Chair to submit the amendment to the House and ascertain whether there are five objections to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not so understand the rule.

Mr. CONGER. The Speaker of this House declared in his place that when that question came up he should feel inclined to submit to the House——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair is bound by nothing but the rules of the House. The new rule under which these bills are being considered requires that each bill shall be subjected to the test of five objectors or more. The rule does not require that amendments which may be offered to such bills shall be subjected to such tests.

Mr. CONGER. That point is now pending before the Chair, and the Chair is bound to recognize what his predecessor, the Speaker of this House, has agreed to submit to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will permit the Chair to say——

Mr. CONGER. And if the present occupant of the chair was not in the House at the time, and did not know what occurred, he must take the statement of members on that subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will permit the Chair to state that the present occupant of the chair has no disposition to overrule or take issue with any decision made by any predecessor. But the gentleman is mistaken; the Chair is not bound to observe anything but the rules of this House, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Which appeal will be submitted to the House.

Mr. CONGER. And I trust that the action upon the appeal will consume the remainder of this hour, so that we may have a presiding——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan will reduce his appeal to writing.

Mr. CONGER. I will do so. [And sat down at his desk.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have moved to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on laying the appeal on the table.

Mr. BURROWS. In order that nothing may be waived, I desire now to make a point of order against the last amendment in relation to the tax on salt.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What is the point of order on that amendment?

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to reserve the point of order.

Mr. FRYE. I trust we may have order for a moment; there is something pretty important pending just now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is impossible to have order unless members will themselves assist in maintaining it.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that a point of order was made—well, not against any amendments strictly speaking; but a point of order was made that every amendment offered to a bill pending under this rule must be submitted by the Chair for objections, and that the Chair overruled that point of order. Is that right?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] will understand that the Chair held that under the call of States no bill could be considered by this House without an opportunity being offered for objections to it.

Mr. FRYE. That is in relation to the original bill. I understand that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] made the point of order that no amendment could be considered until it had been presented to the House for objection; and I understand that the Chair overrules that point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does.

Mr. CLYMER. And the Chair is right.

Mr. FRYE. And I understand that an appeal is entered to that ruling.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the fact.

Mr. FRYE. Is that open for discussion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. A motion to lay the appeal on the table is now pending; and the Chair is waiting for the gentleman from Michigan to furnish the appeal in writing.

Mr. FRYE. I think the House can readily see that if this appeal is not sustained this rule is gone absolutely.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire to debate the motion to lay the appeal on the table?

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; I desire to debate the appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The appeal itself is not now pending.

Mr. CONGER. I hold the floor making any appeal; and while I am reducing it to writing, under the direction of the Chair, no gentleman can get the floor to move to lay it on the table. It is not yet in the possession of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has entertained the appeal.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the Chair will protect my rights while I am fulfilling the orders of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will endeavor to protect the gentleman in every right.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How long are we required to wait for the gentleman from Michigan?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The Chair has asked that the Clerk be furnished with the appeal in writing. The appeal being in the possession of the House was recognized by the Chair, and a motion was made by the gentleman from Illinois to lay that appeal on the table, which motion is now the only motion pending before the House.

Mr. CONGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, from that decision likewise I appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will send up his appeal in writing.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the Chair will not go on with business so as to take advantage of my legal rights on this floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will have all his rights; but certainly he is parliamentarian enough to know that more than one appeal cannot be pending before the House at one time.

Mr. CONGER. Neither can one motion be pending until the other has been submitted to the House. I am preparing my appeal, which the Chair required me to reduce to writing. The Chair cannot go on with business very successfully while I am doing that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is waiting for the gentleman to reduce the appeal to writing and furnish it to the Clerk.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire for the instruction of the House to have read a bill which was offered by Mr. BLACKBURN, of Kentucky, and is now pending in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not in order now. But the Chair will have it read if the gentleman will furnish it to the Clerk.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would like the House and also the Chair to hear the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It shall be read as soon as the matter now pending is disposed of.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, [reading,]

The gentleman from Michigan demanded that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee be submitted to the House for five objections as if an original proposition. The Chair decided that the amendment need not be submitted to five objections. The Chair overruled the point of order and refused to ask for objections to the amendment.

I think I have stated the matter correctly.

From this ruling Mr. CONGER appealed.

I believe that is a correct statement of the question. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak upon my appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will not claim the right to be heard on an appeal when a motion to lay that appeal on the table is pending.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I had the floor and had not even presented my appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman knows, if he will look at the rules prepared by a committee of which he is now a member, as well as in the light of the practice which his long experience has witnessed here, that a motion to lay on the table is entertained whenever it is made. The gentleman from Michigan had stated his appeal. He was not holding the floor. The gentleman from Illinois was recognized, his motion was entertained, nor was objection made to the entertainment of it until after that gentleman had resumed his seat.

Mr. CONGER. Now, will the Chair hear me? The Chair has not yet even stated to the House the appeal; and no motion regarding it can be made until it is in the possession of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is mistaken in his facts. The Chair stated the appeal to the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. CONGER. I have read the appeal. The Chair has not even alluded to it since.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to submit the question whether the spirit of this rule does not require that only those bills shall be considered which——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] is not in order. No debate is in order pending a motion to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. ATKINS. I am not going to debate. I am going to state a proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot under the rule. Under all rules there can be no debate or anything done except a vote on the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The motion to lay upon the table is always in order.

Mr. CONGER. Until I have presented the appeal to the Speaker and the Speaker has presented it to the House I hold the floor. Immediately on presenting it I said I desired to speak on it. The motion to lay the appeal on the table could not be made while I held the floor. I held it while I was writing the appeal, in pursuance of the instruction of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not agree with the gentleman in his conclusions as to his position on the floor, and sees no chance of agreeing with the gentleman in his recollection of the facts.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that I was entitled to the floor, and had the right to speak on this appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair never questioned the gentleman's right to speak on his appeal so long as he was in possession of the floor and prior to the recognition of the gentleman from Illinois, and the acceptance of his motion to lay the appeal on the table, which is not debatable.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Chair to rule on my own statement, that I have not relinquished the floor, and to rule further that I am still entitled to the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The motion to lay upon the table is always in order.

Mr. CONGER. The Speaker had no right to entertain the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending motion is to lay the appeal upon the table, which is not debatable.

Mr. CONGER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is one appeal already pending.

Mr. CONGER. And I appeal again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sees no good to arise from a further prolongation of this discussion.

Mr. CONGER. Then I understand the Chair arbitrarily will not submit my motion to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the gentleman from Michigan misunderstands what the Chair is endeavoring to do.

Mr. CONGER. Then I ask the Chair to submit my appeal to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is going to do that required by the provision of the rules of this House. The question, therefore, is on the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois to lay on the table the appeal taken by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] Those in favor of laying the appeal upon the table will say "ay"——

Mr. CONGER. That cannot go on, Mr. Speaker. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman cannot have two appeals pending at the same time.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that that motion to lay upon the table is not regularly before this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. And from that decision I appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will let the Chair dispose of the appeal now pending before another can be entertained.

Mr. CONGER. Then I could not reach this point at all.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Under the fourth clause of Rule XVI it is declared that a motion to lay an appeal upon the table is in order at any time, even while it is under debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair refers the gentleman from Michigan to that clause of the rule.

Mr. CONGER. That does not cover the point at all; the point was that I had not submitted my appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman's point very well.

Mr. ATKINS. I understood the Chair to decide a while ago that I could not rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the gentleman as rising to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes; I rose to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the gentleman as so stating.

Mr. ATKINS. That is what I rose for and the Chair took me off the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman to say he rose to state a proposition.

Mr. ATKINS. Now I desire to rise to a proposition of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATKINS. It is this: that the spirit of this rule does not admit of discussion any longer than five minutes on any proposition, no matter whether it is on an appeal or anything else, and each State is entitled to be heard for five minutes and no longer. We have now spent half an hour on this proposition to the exclusion of other States which might be heard under this new rule. I trust the Chair will decide that the time for discussion has expired and take a vote and so get away from this subject.

Mr. VALENTINE. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VALENTINE. I desire to know whether if a point of order is made by a member of the House and overruled by the Chair and the Chair directs the member to reduce his appeal to writing, whether the Chair can recognize any one else until that appeal is reduced to writing and read by the Clerk and stated by the Chair to the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no hesitation in stating and repeating that the appeal of the gentleman from Michigan was stated to the Chair.

Mr. VALENTINE. The Chair is not answering my question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will take its own way of answering the question. The appeal was stated by the gentleman from Michigan to the Chair, and the record at the desk shows that the appeal was stated by the Chair to the House, and in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the nature of the appeal and that there be a record of the fact, the Chair asked the gentleman from Michigan to reduce his appeal to writing, but it was in possession of the House, being given by a statement of the Chair to the House. After that the Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois, who took the floor and moved to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. VALENTINE. I have asked the Chair a parliamentary question——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can see that the parliamentary question has already been answered.

Mr. VALENTINE. But the Chair has not answered my question. I did not ask what took place between the Chair and the gentleman from Michigan, but an entirely different question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Which the Chair has answered.

Mr. VALENTINE. I have not heard the answer to my question.

Mr. CONGER. Before that proceeds I wish to ask that the notes of the Official Reporter be read as to what actually occurred when the Chair wanted me to reduce my appeal to writing. I ask that the notes be read.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to state a question of fact.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary question.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire the Chair to recognize me as to a question of fact. I presume that there is no desire on the part of any gentleman to have the present occupant of the chair make a wrong decision or that any ruling shall have a wrong construction. Now, what I wish to state in this connection is that I distinctly recognized as a matter of fact that the gentleman from Michigan was talking, that words were proceeding out of his mouth when the motion of the gentleman from Illinois was submitted; and that being the case I take it for granted that the gentleman from Michigan was proceeding to discuss the question and had not yielded the floor, and that the gentleman from Illinois had not the floor to submit his motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman to rise to a parliamentary question.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Chair if that is not a fact?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And the Chair answers that to his recollection it is not.

Mr. CONGER. And I say that it is substantially true; that it is what took place.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Reporter has been directed to furnish his notes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am informed that the gentleman from New Jersey when he moved his bill demanded the previous question at the same time. If that be so, all amendments afterward until the House had refused to second the demand for the previous question were out of order, and he had the right to move the previous question as soon as he called the bill up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will answer the gentleman's point of order at the proper time.

Mr. SPRINGER. And that would take away the pending amendment, and I ask that the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey be taken as to whether he did or did not demand the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The RECORD does not show that such a demand was made.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that the gentleman from New Jersey be interrogated upon that point.

Mr. ROBINSON. The demand for the previous question was made to-day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I was speaking of the RECORD of Saturday.

Mr. BLAKE. I desire to state that I did demand the previous question this morning.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. I make the point of order that the rule under which we are proceeding now by its spirit and terms confines the consideration of any bill presented by any member from any State to a period not exceeding five minutes. Now, it comes within the restriction of the rule even when the report accompanying a bill is called for to be read that it can only be read for five minutes, and if the reading is not concluded in five minutes it must be stopped, or else the call rests with another State.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman from Mississippi will bear in mind that this motion pending now is to lay an appeal from the decision of the Chair upon the table; and consequently the point of order raised by the gentleman from Mississippi is not at this time before the House or in order for consideration.

Mr. ATKINS. May I inquire why the Chair does not put the motion to the House, then?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is waiting to have the Reporter's minutes of the proceedings read to the House on the demand of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. ATKINS. Will it be in order to move a recess? [Laughter.]

Mr. ATHERTON. Let us go ahead with the public business.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the whole matter will be dropped by unanimous consent, and let us go on with the river and harbor bill, or something else. This is perfect nonsense.

Mr. CLYMER. I am glad the gentleman from Tennessee agrees to the conclusion which we have arrived at some time ago over here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the notes furnished by the Official Reporter.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONGER. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Which appeal will be submitted to the House.

Mr. CONGER. And I trust that the action upon the bill will consume the remainder of this hour so that we may have a presiding——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan will reduce his appeal to writing.

Mr. CONGER. I will do so.

Mr. CONGER. The RECORD report shows what I expected and what I knew to be a fact that an unfinished, a necessarily unfinished sentence was being uttered by me at the time the gentleman from Illinois rose to make his motion, a sentence which evidently has no connection unless it be contemplated that certain other words would follow. It shows that I was upon the floor; that I was in possession of the floor when the gentleman undertook to take the floor from me and make his motion to lay the appeal upon the table. That point, then, I think, is so perfectly apparent that it sustains my claim that I was speaking; that I had not yielded the floor, and was entitled to retain it and was proceeding to conclude my sentence when the gentleman made his motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When the Chair said the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to lay the appeal upon the table was before the House, the gentleman from Michigan had left the floor, at the request of the Chair, and gone to his seat to reduce the appeal to writing.

Mr. CONGER. Oh, no; I take the record and stand upon the record and not my memory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair also rests upon the record and adheres to his ruling.

Mr. CONGER. The record shows I had gone on so far as to say I hoped "the hour would be consumed until a presiding," and there an interruption occurred. That is the record. I ask it to be read again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the fourth clause——

Mr. CONGER. I ask that in the first place the transcript of the Reporter's minutes be again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the Clerk will again read the copy of notes furnished by the Reporter.

Mr. SAMFORD. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAMFORD. It is whether or not a motion for the previous question has been made?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion for the previous question on what?

Mr. SAMFORD. On the bill before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair remembers the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BLAKE] asked for the previous question. But the point was afterward made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] that the bill had never been subjected to the test of objection. The Chair ascertaining this to be the fact from the Clerk, directed that that should be done. The bill was accordingly subjected to objection. No objection was made. Then the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] was offered. Subsequent to that time the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BLAKE] declined to demand the previous question if it was to include the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BLAKE. The exact fact is, I demanded the previous question before any amendment was offered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so recollects; but it was afterward ascertained that the bill had never been subjected to objection, and it was carried back under the rule—by consent, and, in the judgment of the Chair, no one having the right to object—to the point of objection, and was submitted therefor. No objections were made, or at least not a sufficient number. Then it was the gentleman from Tennessee submitted his amendment, and the gentleman from New Jersey demanded the previous question. The Chair asked if the gentleman intended to demand the previous question so that it should include the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, and the gentleman from New Jersey, as the Chair remembers, declared that he did not. At any rate, there was no second for the previous question, although a second to the previous question had been called for by the Chair before the mistake as to the status of the bill had been discovered.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATKINS. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is before the House; is it not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. ATKINS. Then why does the Chair allow it to be debated?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no right to abridge the rights of the House, and has recognized the right of a member to demand the reading of the Reporter's notes.

Mr. ATKINS. I demand that the pending question shall be submitted to the vote of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the right of the gentleman from Michigan to demand the reading of the notes of the Reporter. He has demanded it and they have been read. He asks that they be read a second time. Without objection that will be done, and the Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOUSE. Is it in order to move to lay this whole subject on the table?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order pending the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSHEND.]

Mr. BAYNE. Will the Chair permit me to make a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BAYNE. And I think the answer to that inquiry will solve this question. I wish to ask the Chair if the gentleman from New Jersey, having presented the bill and having demanded the previous question on that, will now rise and say in his place that he intended all along that that demand for the previous question should adhere to his original motion to pass the bill whether or not the Chair would not recognize the word of the gentleman from New Jersey, and relegate this whole matter back to the original proposition that the bill is pending with a demand for the previous question.

Mr. DIBRELL. The gentleman will remember the gentleman from New Jersey withdrew the demand for the previous question to allow the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not hesitate to accept the word of the gentleman from New Jersey as to any matter.

Mr. CLYMER. The bill was not before the House for consideration when that motion was made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has stated his recollection as accurately as possible, that the gentleman from New Jersey demanded the previous question, and subsequently withdrew it when an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, which was accepted by the gentleman from New Jersey; that it was then ascertained the bill had never been subjected to objection and it was carried back to that point, and it was not objected to by a sufficient number to prevent its consideration; and that then the gentleman from Tennessee offered his amendment. The Chair would be glad if the House would allow the Clerk to read again the notes of the Reporter as called for by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. To expedite business, if in order I will withdraw the motion to lay the appeal on the table and also the amendment which I offered.

Mr. HOUSE. Would it now be in order to move to lay this whole subject on the table?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not pending an appeal from the decision of the Chair. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] withdraws his motion to lay the appeal on the table and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan, and the question is on the appeal taken by that gentleman from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. Does the Chair recognize my appeal from the last decision upon my point, that, as shown by the record itself, the Chair had no right to entertain the motion to lay the appeal on the table?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize no appeal by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] or by any other gentleman that is not in writing at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CONGER. Does the Chair direct me to make my second appeal in writing?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not direct the gentleman, but requests him to furnish his appeal in writing.

Mr, CONGER. Does the Chair now recognize me to furnish my appeal in writing?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does.

Mr. CONGER. And I will hold the floor until I can do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. An appeal submitted by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is now pending.

Mr. CONGER. And the Chair has requested me to reduce another appeal to writing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is too good a parliamentarian to imagine that he can submit one appeal while another appeal is pending.

Mr. CONGER. The compliments of the Chair are not undeserved, I admit. [Laughter.] Still I disagree entirely with the opinion of the Chair that I or any other gentleman may not make an appeal from any ruling whenever it comes up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire to be heard upon his appeal?

Mr. CONGER. Upon my first appeal?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon the appeal pending before the House.

Mr. CONGER. That is the first appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not undertake to number the gentleman's appeals.

Mr. CONGER. For my own convenience I would like to make a distinction. Then I conclude that the Chair does not decide that a motion to lay the appeal on the table is in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not responsible for the gentleman's conclusions.

A MEMBER. That motion has been withdrawn.

Mr. CONGER. The motion to lay on the table withdrawn? I did not know that. I now desire to speak on my appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. I have no other interest in this matter than every individual member of this House has in common with me. Whether propositions in the nature of amendments, making entirely new propositions, coming in by way of amendment, should be submitted to the House for five objections——

Mr. FINLEY. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not.

Mr. CONGER. If I have the floor, I would like to have the Chair insist upon the rules being observed, so that I may be heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is itself to blame for this disorder.

Mr. CONGER. But the Speaker is the organ through which I can alone demand to be heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And the Chair has been endeavoring to preserve order.

Mr. CONGER. I say, then, that every member of this House has a great interest in having the question decided whether, when a simple bill or resolution is called up and assent given for its consideration, an entirely different proposition embracing a large range of subjects can be introduced by way of amendment and occupy the attention of the House under this unanimous-consent rule, without such amendment being submitted to the members of the House for five objections.

That point was raised before the Speaker of this House when business under this new rule was last being considered, and the Speaker then stated, if I recollect aright, that it was a very important question, almost a vital one, which he would like to consider, and would decide whenever the occasion arose; and at any rate he said he would submit it to the House. Now, in the absence of the Speaker of this House, who said he would submit that question to the House, I take the opportunity to present the question to the Chair and ask that it be submitted to the House. I make the point of order that it should be submitted to the House, and the Chair overrules that point of order. Now, the result of that ruling, as every gentleman on this floor will see, will be to secure five objections to every bill that could be amended, and thus defeat the entire action of this unanimous-consent rule.

Mr. CARLISLE. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CONGER. With pleasure.

Mr. CARLISLE. It is this: that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] who offered the amendment which has given rise to this discussion and occasioned this appeal has withdrawn it, and it is no longer before the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] is mistaken. The amendment of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] is pending, and it was upon that amendment that the point was raised.

Mr. CARLISLE. I beg pardon, then.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Michigan allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CONGER. In one moment; I have but a moment or two left. Now, with all due respect to the Chair, (and the Chair knows that I have no possible intention in the little passage of words between us to say anything that would be offensive,) I asked that the Chair should take the sense of the House upon the proposition that amendments themselves shall be subject to the five objections provided by the rule. The Chair refused to let that question be submitted to the House. From that ruling I appealed, as my appeal in writing will show. Now it is unimportant to me personally, but it is a matter that affects every member who has a bill or proposition here which he desires to have considered under this rule, because unless that be the construction of the rule no man will dare to have any bill before this House for consideration which may be amended to the detriment of his constituents and of the interests of his people. Therefore it stops all action under this five-objection rule. I stated to the House positively the other day that unless it was held that amendments should be submitted to the House for five objections, I and others would object to every bill relating to the revenue which might be amended by general provisions of amendment.

I have striven hard to bring this question to the attention of gentlemen of the House. They will meet it every time a bill is presented for consideration under the new rule. I would like the opinion of the House as to whether it is the better way to have not only the bill itself but also any amendment submitted to five objections, so that we may go on with business and not waste time in raising questions on objectionable amendments, or it may be "filibustering" to defeat action by the House during the hour.

For these reasons I have so earnestly persisted in my effort to have this question submitted to the House. If the House should overrule me, if it should consider the ruling of the Chair to be in accordance with the spirit of the five-objection rule, I shall submit, of course; but I want the opinion of the House upon the question.

Mr. ROBESON addressed the Chair.

Mr. HOOKER. I raise the point that the morning hour has expired. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. I take the floor for the purpose of moving to go into Committee of the Whole on the river and harbor appropriation bill; but before doing so I propose to yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. TYLER] and others who desire to make brief addresses in connection with the presentation of the statue of Jacob Collamer.

STATUE OF JACOB COLLAMER.

Mr. TYLER. Mr. Speaker, I call up for the consideration of the House the concurrent resolution from the Senate accepting from the State of Vermont the statue of the late Jacob Collamer.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 31, 1881.

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the thanks of this Congress be presented to the governor, and through him to the people of the State of Vermont, for the statue by Preston Powers of Jacob Collamer, as an eminent American statesman; that this work of art is accepted and assigned a place in the National Statuary Hall set apart by Congress for the statues of distinguished citizens from the several States; and that a copy of this resolution, signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Vermont.

Attest: JOHN C. BURCH,
Secretary.

Mr. TYLER. Mr. Speaker, I highly appreciate the courtesy of the honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] in temporarily laying aside the river and harbor bill for the consideration of this concurrent resolution, which, since its adoption on the part of the Senate, has been unavoidably delayed in the House until this time.

In July, 1864, Congress passed an act setting apart the historic and beautiful old Representatives Hall as a hall of statuary, and authorizing the President to invite each and all the States to furnish statues in marble or bronze, not exceeding two in number from each State, of deceased persons who had been citizens thereof and illustrious for their historic renown, or for distinguished civic or military services, such as each State should determine to be worthy of this national commemoration.

In pursuance thereof the Legislature of Vermont, in 1872, passed an act directing the governor to contract, in behalf of the State, with Hiram Powers for a statue of Jacob Collamer, and with Larkin G. Mead for a statue of Ethan Allen, the statues when completed to be placed in this National Statuary Hall.

In May, 1876, the statue of Ethan Allen, conceived, modeled, and executed by Larkin G. Mead, himself a son of Vermont, and one of the nation's most gifted artists, was, by the State, through its governor, placed in the Hall in commemoration of the military history of the State and of its most renowned military chieftain.

Hiram Powers, who was a native of Woodstock, the home of Jacob Collamer, having died in June, 1873, in Italy, where he had resided during the greater part of his life, the Legislature of my State subsequently conferred upon the governor a discretion to contract with some other person for the creation of the statue of Mr. Collamer, and the governor exercised that discretion wisely in contracting therefor with Preston Powers, a son of the great artist.

No higher commendation need be bestowed on this rising sculptor than to say that he possesses much of his father's genius, and that he has already acquired a degree of skill in the execution and finish of his works, which, with his devotion to his profession, gives him promise of a rank with the best artists of the age. As evidence of this, I need only refer to his busts of Charles Sumner, Professor Agassiz, the poet Whittier, General Grant, and others, and his ideal figure, "Maud Muller," still remaining in his studio in Florence, Italy, and the statue which is now presented.

Jacob Collamer was born in Troy, New York, in January, 1791. When he was a child he moved with his father's family to Burlington, Vermont, where he passed his early life and where he graduated at the University of Vermont at the age of nineteen years. He studied law with Judge Asa Aldis, then one of the ablest lawyers in the State; was admitted to the bar in 1813 and commenced practice in Windsor County, where he always afterward resided. He rose rapidly to distinction at the bar and for years before his elevation to the supreme court of the State, in 1833, he stood in the highest rank of the profession. He occupied a seat upon the bench for nine years, and until his election to this House, of which he became a member in 1843, and remained such until 1849, when he resigned to enter as Postmaster-General the Cabinet of President Taylor. On the death of the President, in July of the following year, Mr. Collamer resigned, as did all the members of the Cabinet, and returned to his home in Vermont. But a man of his abilities could not be permitted to remain long in retirement. In October of that year he was elected by the Legislature presiding judge of his judicial circuit, which place he held till his election, in 1854, to the Senate of the United States, in which he took his seat in December, 1855. He was elected to a second term in 1860, and served about four years, when he died at his home in Woodstock, in November, 1865, after thirty-two years of most valuable public service.

But few citizens of Vermont have been called to so many positions of trust and honor as was Jacob Collamer, and few, indeed, have performed such varied duties with stricter fidelity, with more marked ability, or reflected greater honor upon the State than he did. Some of her public men may have shone with greater brilliancy, but none with a steadier or more enduring light.

It is not for me on this occasion to enter upon an analysis of his character, to speak at length of his public services, or to do more than pay a passing tribute to his memory. He was called, and justly so, a self-made man, but Nature gave him the materials with which to make a man far above the common order. She endowed him with great intellectual faculties which he developed and cultivated to a high degree. He stored his mind with vast and varied learning, well arranged, and kept by a retentive memory always at ready command. A close student, with quick perception, a sound judgment, remarkable executive ability, all his actions guided and governed by high moral principle, he could not fail to become eminent in whatever position he occupied.

As a lawyer, he was distinguished for his uprightness, his thorough knowledge of the legal science, his skill in the conduct of causes, and his power as an advocate, displayed "by the calm exertion of reason" before juries and courts; as a judge, for his impartiality, his quick apprehension of the merits and demerits of every cause presented for his consideration, and for the clearness, vigor, and erudition of his opinions. As a statesman, I have only to point to his record for sixteen years in the House and in the Senate, which belongs not to Vermont alone but to the whole country.

His ten years' service in the Senate was closely identified with an important period of the nation's history; to speak of it would be to recall many of the subjects that engaged the grave attention of Congress previous to the rebellion, the war legislation, and the reconstruction measures that followed upon the restoration of peace, which time will not permit.

On the event of his death, Senator Riddle, of Delaware, doubtless expressed the sentiment of the Senate toward him when he said:

I think Vermont has lost one of her brighest jewels, the Senate one of its most courteous members, and the country one of its greatest statesmen. He was great in feeling, great in thought, and great in action.

Mr. Speaker, Vermont is proud to present his statue to the nation to be placed in the Hall with others of the illustrious dead. There may it stand as long as the Republic endures in commemoration of the distinguished character and services of him whom his State has selected from her long list of eminent jurists and statesmen as the fit representative of one of the most intelligent Commonwealths of the country.

Mr. LORING. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested to join in the ceremony of presenting to the Congress of the United States a statue of one of the distinguished statesmen of Vermont, whose services in directing the social and civil system of that Commonwealth, which has placed her in the front rank of her associates in this Union, can never be forgotten, and have endeared his name to her sons wherever they may be found. To this request I respond with a deep consciousness of the sacredness of the task. The Hall which once echoed the voices of the great men who shaped our laws in the early period of the Republic is now dedicated—I trust for all time to come—as a historic national gallery to preserve the solemn group of the founders of our States and the framers and preservers of our Government. To have won a place in that assembly constitutes the full measure of American civic greatness; and the popular verdict which selects from the multitude of the dead those who are to be immortalized there is entitled to our profoundest respect and admiration; for be he warrior or statesman who stands there the work which he performed on earth has made him dear to the hearts of that people whose institutions he founded and preserved.

Already has Vermont set there the statue of him who was her leader in the heroic age which preceded her organization as a State. During that long and weary struggle commencing with the Indian warfare, which extended from the shores of Narragansett Bay to the flashing waters of the Connecticut, and ending with a determined resistance to Great Britain on the one hand and the Province and State of New York on the other, the bold, hardy, defiant spirit was developed, which is represented by the stalwart form of Ethan Allen.

But now upon the firm foundation of these manly virtues she has erected a civil structure whose architect she brings forward as entitled to a high place in the immortal gallery. Wearied with war, confused by conflicting jurisdictions, exasperated by assumed authority, contending as a colony and a State for independent existence, she entered upon the work of framing a constitution and organizing a commonwealth. Recognizing with an instinct peculiar to every people who have established their freedom with the sword the rights and privileges upon which popular government must rest, she turned to the work performed by those who under more fortunate circumstances had completed the fabric she was about to erect. Pennsylvania offered her advice, and the constitution of that State, framed probably by Franklin, was made the foundation of the government of Vermont. From the statute-book of Connecticut she selected many of her most wholesome laws. She became familiar with the bill of rights and the constitutional provisions of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Before her lay the laws of Virginia and the constitution which John Cooke had provided for the Carolinas. She provided for religious freedom, declaring "that all men have a natural and inalienable right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences," and ending with the injunction that "every sect or denomination of people ought to * * * keep up and support some sort of religious worship, which to them shall seem most agreeable to the revealed will of God." She asserted that "the people have a right to freedom of speech and of writing and publishing their sentiments, therefore the freedom of the press ought not to be restrained," and that "the printing presses shall be free to every person who undertakes to examine the proceedings of the Legislature or any part of the government." She declared that "a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, industry, and frugality are absolutely necessary to preserve the blessings of liberty and keep government free. The people ought therefore to pay particular attention to these points in the choice of officers and representatives;" and it was therefore provided "that no person shall be capable of holding any civil office in this State except he has acquired and maintains a good moral character." She stipulated that "all elections, whether by the people or in General Assembly, shall be by ballot, free and voluntary; and any elector who shall receive any gift or reward for his vote in meat, drink, moneys, or otherwise, shall forfeit his right to elect at that time;" and any one who shall offer or give such rewards "shall thereby be rendered incapable to serve for the ensuing year." She set forth that, "as every freeman to preserve his independence (if without a sufficient estate) ought to have some profession, calling, trade, or farm whereby he may honestly subsist, there can be no nescessity for nor use in establishing offices of profit, the usual effects of which are dependence and servility unbecoming freemen in the possessors or expectants, and faction, contention, corruption, and disorder among the people." The penal code was stern and sweeping, punishing murder and the profanity of "high-handed blasphemy" alike with death.

It has been well said by her venerable historian that—

The natural freedom of man; the inherence of power in the people; the establishment of government for the benefit of all; the purity of the ballot-box; the subserviency of private property to public uses; the trial by jury; the sacredness of hearth and home; the subordination of the military to the civil power; the right of petition and remonstrance—these, and other principles equally noble, were asserted with unaffected confidence in this exposition of the moral, civil, and political faith of the people of Vermont.

Organized on these principles, Vermont applied for admission into the Union, and on the 18th of February, 1791, Congress by an act declared "that on the 4th day of March, 1791, the said State, by the name and style of 'the State of Vermont,' shall be received and admitted into this Union as a new and entire member of the United States of America." Of the men who thus created this Commonwealth and led her into the family of States the names of Thomas Chittenden, Moses Robinson, Nathaniel Chipman, Stephen R. Bradley, Ira Allen, Ebenezer Allen, Jonathan Hunt, magistrates, jurists, lawyers, men foremost in their own generation, and many of whose descendants are foremost in ours, stand conspicuous, and would seem to claim for one of their number the high honor which has been bestowed upon Jacob Collamer, who, coming after them, seemed to unite all the qualities which made them the leaders of their day, and stands foremost and alone as magistrate, jurist, legislator, Cabinet minister, Senator, and as the representative of that high-toned and sturdy Commonwealth whose principles of government I have endeavored to define.

It was while the convention which petitioned for the admission of Vermont into the Union was in session, and a month before the admission was completed by act of Congress, that Jacob Collamer was born—a native of that State with which Vermont had had her long and invigorating and successful contest. And it was in 1813, when the State of his adoption had been engaged for twenty-two years in developing her institutions, and had already enrolled a long list of scholars and statesmen, that he commenced his career as a lawyer in one of her thriving and beautiful towns. There was even then, twenty years after her organization, much to be done to give Vermont a commanding position among the States of that Union which she had joined. And upon this young lawyer as he went on in life this service seems to have fallen. In his character he seemed to represent those qualities which had carried Vermont through her early struggles, and had led her to adopt a constitution based on the soundest principles of free government. In the war of 1812 he closed his office and joined the army of the United States as lieutenant of artillery, and placed his name in that martial roll for which Vermont had already become distinguished. In 1821 he was called by his townsmen into civil service, and commenced a public career which closed only with his death in 1865, and during which he secured the high position as the representative citizen of Vermont in her early years as an independent Commonwealth.

The statue, which has been carved with such severe and touching and expressive simplicity, and has been placed by his grateful fellow-citizens in the historic Hall of the Capitol, reminds us that he, more than all others, shaped and molded and gave character to the State in whose service he was so long engaged. He thoroughly comprehended that constitution which I have laid before you, and instinctively and without effort was guided by it as citizen and magistrate. He was a Christian gentleman, and accepting that freedom of conscience in matters of religion which was recognized in the constitution, he was liberal and tolerant while firm in the faith. Strong and honest in his convictions, he demanded freedom of speech and the press for all men. Temperate and frugal in all his ways, he stood as an example of those virtues which his State required by constitution in her rulers. Incapable of bribery himself, he recognized no temptation in others, and, called to office which he never sought, he discharged his duties faithfully and exercised such economy as the small rewards of public position rendered necessary. He believed in the genius of that constitution which laid these principles and characteristics at the foundation of the State. His mind accepted readily the high requirements of constitution and law in the State of his adoption, and to whatever public service he was called he was recognized as the embodiment of that stern Puritan code.

This, then, constitutes his greatness, that he was true to the spirit of his Commonwealth, and the highest doctrines of State and society in his country, and that he never faltered in their defense and advocacy. He brought to the bar the consciousness of being governed by a sense of right and justice, and an intellectual adroitness which could not be led astray into devious paths. He brought to the bench a sound knowledge of the law, an unerring judgment, and keen perception. He brought to the halls of legislation an honest purpose, a quick understanding, and great power of statement. He brought to all his public service a fearless conscience, great devotion, and undoubted courage, great simplicity and great prudence, which seemed to the more demonstrative and impetuous like timidity and indecision. For more than forty years, however, years of great moment, crowded with critical events, he so bore himself as to secure the confidence of his State, the admiration of his friends, the respect of his opponents. During these years from 1821, when he entered the Legislature of Vermont, to 1865, when he died, there was written the most remarkable chapter of American history; and in that period he unostentatiously performed his part well, and in accordance with those doctrines which he adopted when he entered upon his career as citizen and servant of the State of Vermont.

While it did not fall upon him to create and organize and expound as it did upon Parsons and Marshall, while he followed in the footsteps of great judicial wisdom on the bench of that State, and had before him the brilliant career of Royall Tyler who as jurist, scholar, poet, novelist, had illumined the early intellectual history of Vermont, it was left for him to lay down a body of law which for freedom from bias, broad comprehension, logical precision, and purity of diction has not been surpassed. Filled with a profound love of his profession, and with a religious faith in the wisdom of the Constitution upon which his opinions were founded, he filled in every way the measure of a good lawyer and a wise judge. Passing from the severe training of this service into the stormy arena of legislative debate, he displayed the calm determination of an enlightened and approving conscience, the readiness of a clear understanding, the force of wit, and the power of an amiable and unruffled spirit. As a member of the Legislature of Vermont from 1821 to 1828, and of the constitutional convention of 1836, he witnessed and took part in that stormy political period during which the younger Adams rose and fell, and the power and patriotism of Andrew Jackson inspired a party with new life and drew to his side in the great crisis the majestic leader of the opposition, who won in that contest the proud title of Defender of the Constitution. Entering Congress in 1842, as a member of that party which was then engaged in bitter strife over the fruitless victory of 1840, he took part in the first act of that great political drama which in peace and in war has been enacted on this continent from that hour to this.

It cannot be said of him that as Representative or Senator or Cabinet minister he created any political issue or sounded the note of any political contest. But it can be said of him that in the struggle of 1846 he represented the moral sentiment of his State and established her political position on a foundation which has not yet been shaken. Never engaging in the irritations of sectional strife he always accepted the issue firmly and calmly, and supported his own cause with courage and power, not always with a manner satisfactory to the impetuous minds which had inspired the contest, but always with a method which brought to their support the earnest and reflecting. In all that long period of desperate endeavor, when great events crowded upon each other in rapid succession and great reputations were made and great reputations ruined, this calm and determined statesman of Vermont displayed the true courage and wisdom of a guide who knows the peril and the path to safety. History has recorded the grandeur of the great debate which for years occupied the leaders in the conflict and filled the minds of the people with high purpose, and all along its pages may be found an array of names which can never be forgotten while this Government endures. And among them stands the Senator from Vermont who stood firm in every crisis, and who, on more than one occasion, so presented the issue to the American people that a resolute and defiant determination took the place of desperate enthusiasm and inspired them with firmness for the conflict.

This is the man whom Vermont has selected as her guiding and representative statesman, and whose statue she presents to her country as her tribute to the illustrious group which is slowly gathering in yonder Hall. As I contemplate the simple and quiet dignity, the calm intelligence, the sweet and amiable spirit, the resolute purpose which mark that faithful and impressive image of her chosen jurist and statesman, I rejoice with her that she has bestowed upon her country so noble an example of the American citizen, one who will always be remembered as the—

> Justum et tenacem propositi virum,
> Non civium ardor prava jubentium
> Non vultus instantis tyranni
> Mente quatit solida;

One—

> Whose armor was his honest thought,
> And simple truth his utmost skill!

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House while I add a few remarks to what has been so appropriately and eloquently said by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. TYLER] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LORING] in support of the resolution under consideration. The occasion is to me impressive and suggestive. The distinguished statesman whose statue is now presented under the act of Congress of 1864 by the State of Vermont I knew well and intimately for several years. We entered Congress together in 1843 and remained in the House together until 1849, when he was appointed to the office of Postmaster-General. During the three Congresses, the Twenty-eighth, Twenty-ninth, and Thirtieth, of our joint service in the old legislative Hall for two years we occupied adjacent seats. We were also of the same mess at Mrs. Carter's boarding-house in the old Dowson row on Capitol Hill, over yonder, a little northeast of the present Senate Chamber, which has within the last few years been removed for the enlargement of the Capitol grounds. He contributed much "to the light of the life" of that mess, where were Taney, Story, McLean, and McKinley of the Supreme Court bench, and Peters, the old reporter, with John J. Crittenden (Senator) and Henry Grider, (Member,) of Kentucky; Henry Y. Cranston, of Rhode Island; Meredith P. Gentry and Edward H. Ewing, of Tennessee; Allen F. Owen, Toombs, and myself, of Georgia, with other occasional visitant lawyers attending the Supreme Court, among whom were the elder Thomas Ewing, of Ohio, with his little son bearing his father's name, who is now a distinguished member of this House, and the present Chief-Justice Waite, and Mr. Evarts, now Secretary of State.

I well recollect Judge Collamer's first speech in the House. It was in support of the constitutionality of the law of Congress providing for the election of members of the House in all the States by districts, instead of what was called the general-ticket system. Macaulay says that on the celebrated trial of the bishops in the "reign of James II," Lord John Somers (then an unknown barrister) made a speech of a little over five minutes, with such force and power that when he sat down his reputation as an orator and constitutional lawyer was established.

This speech of Judge Collamer, not over thirty minutes in length, was so pointed, clear, logical, and conclusive, that it put him at once in the front rank of debaters, lawyers, and jurists in the House, where were Robert C. Winthrop, Daniel Barnard, Meredith P. Gentry, the two Ingersolls, (brothers, Jared and Joseph R.,) R. Barnwell Rhett, Kenneth Rayner, Alexander Dromgoole, Dixon H. Lewis, Cave Johnson, Henry A. Wise, and "the old man eloquent," John Quincy Adams, many of whom and others had already attained a national and some of them a world-wide reputation.

Of the new members who came in the House with myself and the distinguished deceased, in honor of whom we received this statue, only three, I believe, besides myself are now in public life. These are the learned and scholarly George P. Marsh, of Vermont, a distinguished colleague of the deceased, who is still in the service of the country abroad, the present senior Senator from Maine, Mr. HAMLIN, ex-Vice-President of the United States, and Alexander Ramsey, the present distinguished Secretary of War.

This occasion, Mr. Speaker, I have said is to me impressive; it is profoundly so. It revives many pleasant reminiscences, and also causes many sad and melancholy reflections.

In the language of one of Nature's truest poets I can most truly say:

> Still o'er these scenes my memory wakes,
> And fondly broods with miser care;
> Time but the impression deeper makes,
> As streams their channels deeper wear.

What changes have taken place since those days! What changes in the personnel of those conducting the public affairs of our country! What changes in the outward, material world! What progress in art, in science, in steam, in the telephone, in meteorology, the signal service, in photography, in the telegraph, and other uses and applications of the wonderful but hidden power of electricity! But enough upon these subjects now.

This occasion is also, as I have said, suggestive. It is suggestive, among other things, of that question so ably and eloquently discussed by Rome's greatest orator as well as profoundest casuist and philosopher. Cicero, so entertaining in all matters touched by him, has left few papers more instructive than his treatise entitled "De Finibus," in which he treats of the "Ends," or what should be the chief aims and objects of life.

These ceremonies and the National Statuary Hall will teach the youth of the land in succeeding generations as they come and go that the chief end of human effort in a sublunary view should be usefulness to mankind, and that all true fame which should be perpetuated by public pictures, statues, and monuments, is to be acquired only by noble deeds and high achievements and the establishment of a character founded upon the principles of truth, uprightness, and inflexible integrity; and that—

> Honor and shame from no condition rise;
> Act well your part, there all the honor lies.

The late distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Sumner) in characterizing Jacob Collamer styled him "the Green Mountain Socrates." In this he was right, not only in the sense in which he illustrated his meaning, but also in another. Collamer was not only Socratic in his mode of reasoning, his manner of "handling" a subject under discussion, and the earnestness of his convictions, but he came as near the rule laid down by Socrates as a test of wisdom as any man I ever knew. This great teacher said that the highest of all wisdom is a knowledge of the boundary line between the known and the unknown.

The subject of this tribute was a striking example of wisdom of this order. He was a man of great probity, of most exemplary conduct, and of sincere piety, but never indulged in the expression of positive opinions or even speculations upon the unknown or what he did not clearly understand in any sphere of thought.

This occasion, Mr. Speaker, is also highly suggestive in another respect, especially to all of us in this House and just now while we are in the chilling shadow of death which has so recently stricken one of our most distinguished associates, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.] It teaches that in all our conflicts and struggles and aspirations for success, for ascendency and distinction and worldly fame, we should remember and ever bear in mind the great truth that—

> The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
> And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
> Await alike the inevitable hour.
> The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Man's highest aspirations should be for objects and ends in another and higher sphere of existence. [Applause.]

Mr. TYLER. I now move the adoption of the concurrent resolution of the Senate.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. TYLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 2165) for the relief of Sidney P. Luther, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. REAGAN. I should like very much to oblige gentlemen who make requests of me to yield the floor, but if I yield to one I will get into trouble, and therefore am compelled to insist upon my motion that the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill; and, pending that motion, I move all further debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto shall be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman will yield to me. It will not take up much time.

Mr. TALBOTT. I thought the gentleman would yield to me in reference to a soldier's monument.

Mr. REAGAN. I must insist upon my motion.

The motion closing debate was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I now insist on my motion to go into committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes. The Clerk will report the pending paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Oakland Harbor, California, $60,000; and the sums of money heretofore appropriated for this improvement and unexpended are hereby reappropriated; but the sums so appropriated and reappropriated shall not be available until the right of the United States to the bed of the estuary and training walls of this work is secured, free of expense to the Government, in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War.

Mr. PAGE. I move to amend that paragraph by striking out these words:

And the sums of money heretofore appropriated for this improvement and unexpended are hereby reappropriated; but the sums so appropriated and reappropriated shall not be available until the right of the United States to the bed of the estuary and training walls of this work is secured, free of expense to the Government, in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War.

If the House should strike out these words I will then, by the consent of the committee, at the end of the bill add that no money appropriated by this bill shall be available until the rights of the United States to make such improvements as are herein provided shall be secured free to the United States in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from California, if he desires to address the committee on the whole subject, he had better move to strike out and insert.

Mr. PAGE. I do not care to insert the amendment here. If the words indicated in my amendment are stricken out, then my amendment will more properly come in at the end of the bill.

Now, one word, Mr. Chairman, why this appropriation in my judgment should be stricken out. In the first place there is no question in the mind of the Secretary of War as to the right of the United States to make this improvement. The bill adopted last year had a similar provision to the one contained in this bill. The Secretary of War immediately called upon the Attorney-General of the United States for his legal opinion as to the right of the United States to make this improvement. That opinion is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, June 28, 1880.

SIR: Your letter of the 18th instant calls my attention to the report of the United States attorney for California, upon the subject of the title to the channel entrance to Oakland Harbor in that State. It also informs me that in the river and harbor act approved June, 1880, the following clause occurs:

"Improving Oakland Harbor, California, $60,000; and the sums of money heretofore appropriated for this improvement are hereby reappropriated, but the sums so appropriated and reappropriated shall not be available until the right of the United States to the bed of the estuary and training-walls of this work is secured, free of expense to the Government, in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War."

Upon this report, in connection with the clause just quoted, you request my opinion upon the question whether the United States now has the legal right to the bed of the estuary and training-walls of this work.

Upon the facts as stated by the United States attorney, the estuary in question is a navigable estuary, through which the tide ebbs and flows, and the training walls of the work are below high-water mark. It is not necessary, therefore, to consider whether or not the soil of the beach between high and low water mark or the bed of the estuary belongs to any private persons. The only question to be determined is whether the United States have such a right that, whatever may be the title of riparian proprietors, they may prosecute the work of improvement of the harbor, and erect such structures as they deem necessary for the purpose, without affording any just cause of complaint to such private owners.

The language of the clause is undoubtedly ex industria; and, while the right of the United States is to be secured (free of expense to the Government) to the bed of the estuary and training-walls, it is not contemplated that it shall have necessarily an absolute title, in the full sense of those words, to the bed of the estuary or to such portions of the banks and bed as are occupied by the training-walls. The title to the lands which the United States proposes to use for the purpose of structures for the improvement of the harbor below high-water mark is derived from the State. But the State itself does not possess any right, either by virtue of its sovereignty or its ownership, which could in any way control the right of the United States, conferred by the Constitution, to regulate commerce. This right includes the right to regulate navigation, and hence to regulate and improve navigable waters; and this it may do by the erection of such structures as it deems necessary for the purpose, no matter what the effect may be upon the subordinate rights of the owners of the soil covered by such navigable waters. The bed of the estuary in question being the bed of a navigable stream or sheet of water, to the use of the harbor made by which training-walls and other structures are essential, they may be used as appropriately as culverts, drains, or embankments may be for the purpose of the construction and proper enjoyment of a public road.

The report of the United States attorney cites many authorities sustaining the proposition that private rights in land covered by navigable waters are necessarily subject to the higher rights of the public. I observe one, however, which failed to meet his attention, which gives a full and clear view of the whole subject, (South Carolina vs. Georgia et al., 93 United States, 4.) The whole subject is so elaborately discussed in this case that I deem it superfluous to do more than to refer to it.

In direct answer to your inquiry, I am of opinion that the United States has a legal right to use the bed of the estuary in question for the purpose of said improvement, by the erection of training-walls or any other appropriate structure, and that the owners of the soil can make no complaint of such use.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. DEVENS,
Attorney-General.

Hon. ALEXANDER RAMSEY, Secretary of War.

I call the attention of the committee to the order of the Secretary of War, under that opinion of the Attorney-General, to the Chief of Engineers, and to the order of the Chief of Engineers to Lieutenant Colonel George H. Mendell:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, February 15, 1881.

SIR: Referring to your telegram of the 14th instant, requesting copy of order from the Secretary of War directing Colonel George H. Mendell, Corps of Engineers, to expend money for improvements of Oakland Harbor, I have respectfully to inclose herewith copy of indorsement of the Secretary of War of July 16, 1880, and also copy of instruction to Colonel Mendell of July 20, communicating the same.

Very respectfully,

JOHN TWEEDALE,
Acting Chief Clerk.

Hon. H. F. PAGE, House of Representatives.

---

JUNE 28, 1880.

Department of Justice, in re improvement Oakland Harbor, California.

Subject: Title to the channel-entrance to the harbor.

Opinion: That the United States has a legal right to use the bed of the estuary in question for the purpose of said improvement, and that the owners of the soil can make no complaint.

[Indorsement.]

The Chief of Engineers will advise Lieutenant Colonel Mendell, or such other engineer officer who may be in charge of the work, of this opinion, directing him to proceed with the work in accordance with the approved plans and estimates heretofore submitted.

ALEX. RAMSEY,
Secretary of War.

JULY 16, 1880.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., July 20, 1880.

SIR: Your letter of the 26th ultimo, submitting project for the application of the appropriation of June 14, 1880, "for improving Oakland Harbor, California, $60,000, and the sums of money heretofore appropriated for this improvement and unexpended are hereby reappropriated, but the sums so appropriated and reappropriated shall not be available until the right of the United States to the bed of the estuary and training walls of the work is secured, free of expense to the Government, in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War," has been received.

The project is approved. The $60,000 appropriated by the river and harbor act of March 3, 1879, is deemed to have been reappropriated.

In connection with this subject, a copy of the opinion of the honorable the Attorney-General of the United States, dated June 28, 1880, relative to the improvement of Oakland Harbor, California, and the channel entrance thereto, with indorsement of the honorable the Secretary of War thereon, dated July 16, 1880, is furnished for your information and guidance.

You will proceed accordingly.

By command of Brigadier-General Wright.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. M. ADAMS,
Captain of Engineers.

Lieutenant-Colonel GEORGE H. MENDELL,
Corps of Engineers, San Francisco, California.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the only question which has ever arisen in this matter was settled years ago. Soon after this work had been entered upon by the General Government, Colonel Mendell made mention of the fact in a report to the Engineer Department that the Oakland Water Front Company had laid claim to certain lands between high-tide and the ship channel, and that the Government could not and did not recognize the right of any private corporation to any portion of this land. Then Congress in its appropriation made it conditional upon the Oakland Water Front Company to cede whatever rights it had, if any, to the United States.

As I said at the last Congress, these conditions were imposed upon the river and harbor bill, and in accordance with the instructions in that bill the Secretary of War submitted this whole question to the Attorney-General of the United States. Now, the Attorney-General of the United States called upon the United States attorney of San Francisco for a report upon the subject, and upon that response he based his report to the Secretary of War, upon which this money was ordered to be expended. And that is all that can be done. There is no higher authority to appeal to than the law officer of the Government of the United States, whose opinion as submitted is clear and explicit and cites also the opinion of various decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States to sustain him; and why this special appropriation should be tied up in this manner continually, year after year, after the law officer of the Government has given an opinion which obviates the necessity or the propriety of such restriction, is more than I can understand. I ask, therefore, as a matter of right, that it be stricken out for the reason that it causes useless and unnecessary delay and trouble in a matter which is of great importance in the affairs of this people who are so interested in this question. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Commerce will consent to strike it out now. I am informed and believe that a majority of the committee are in favor of striking it ont. But if such a proviso is to be incorporated in this appropriation bill and appended to any provision of it, then I ask that it be made a general provision, and that it be extended to all places which may be involved in the same manner or present the same conditions, rather than that it shall be a special restriction to this one point, where it has no applicability and where it only effects a hinderance and delay. If this provision is a general one and applies to all places in the United States where it is proposed to make such improvements, it might not be so objectionable. But as well might any gentleman come up here and say, "I claim a right to a portion of the improvements of Galveston Harbor, or of Boston Harbor," and upon that mere statement the Committee on Commerce of this House would have the same right to impose such a restriction as to the expenditure of money as they have to this work, which has been clearly recognized all over these different appropriations, and where over two hundred and sixty thousand dollars has been already expended.

I hope the money in this case will no longer be tied up by such a restriction.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy the attention of the House as briefly as possible in the consideration of this matter, and shall take up no time in discussing the propriety of the amendments which may be submitted, for the reason that this is a bill which should pass without delay, because all the works which have already been commenced upon these public improvements will be suspended necessarily unless this bill becomes a law.

Oakland Harbor is one of great necessity and importance to the Pacific coast. The subject of appropriations for that harbor have been under discussion on every bill for the last six years.

I deem it proper to make this statement to the House as to the ground upon which the qualification proposed in this bill as to the expenditure of money for the improvement of that harbor is made. The United States, it appears, relinquished to the State of California the submerged lands in the bay of San Francisco. Under the title from the United States to the State of California the Pacific Railroad Company obtained possession of the submerged lands. The work now being done is by dredging an estuary from the deep water of the bay into Oakland Harbor, and the building of training walls for protecting the harbor. The Pacific Railroad Company claims the right to this property as being part of the submerged lands secured under their title. The railroad company, therefore, has as much interest in the improvement of the harbor as any other portion of the people.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. REAGAN. I cannot submit now to an interruption.

Mr. PAGE. I wish merely to say that the gentleman is clearly mistaken. The railroad company make no claim whatever, if the Water Front Company——

Mr. REAGAN. I beg to insist upon my statement as true, and hope that I will not be interrupted. They have been appealed to to relinquish to the Government the right to the estuary which has been made largely by the dredging boats of the United States, and the training walls also built by it and at its expense. They refuse to surrender the right which they claim and ask the execution of a project, requiring more than a million of dollars to complete, on what they claim is their private property. Now, we might go on and expend the million of dollars or over, and they can of course demand control of the whole of it after it is done, under the claim now submitted of their title to the land. When the work is completed they can say to the Government which built it, you must pay us the value of the work, whatever it may be, before you can be privileged to use it. Therefore what the Committee on Commerce have seen proper to do is to say to this company that you must relinquish your claim to the right of this estuary and the training walls before we will allow a dollar of this money to be expended.

Now, my friend from California presents what he says is an opinion of the Attorney-General disposing of the whole question; and while this may be an opinion covering the ground alleged, I claim, and I call the attention of the committee to it, that it goes to no statement of the facts in the opinion as to the basis on which it is founded. The facts of the case are not alluded to at all, and from that I am inclined to believe that the opinion of the Attorney-General was founded upon no question touching the basis or right of these claimants, that question not being discussed in that opinion at all. And if they were alluded to, while the opinion of the Attorney-General would be persuasive as the opinion of a great lawyer and law officer, it does not settle the question of title. It is not an adjudication of the question in any sense, for in the face of that opinion, instead of relinquishing the right to the estuary and training walls, these gentlemen refuse to do it and seek the repeal of the provision to which reference is made.

The question being taken on Mr. PAGE'S amendment, there were—ayes 52, noes 64.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "reappropriated" to the end of the paragraph, namely, the words "but the sums so appropriated and reappropriated shall not be available until the right of the United States to the bed of the estuary and training walls of this work is secured, free of expense to the Government, in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"But no money appropriated by this bill shall be available until the rights of the United States to make such improvements as are herein provided shall be secured free to the United States in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War."

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House, the amendment is not debatable.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I know that; but I desire to offer a substitute which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

No money appropriated by this act shall be expended in the improvement of any stream, or part thereof, notwithstanding the same be designated and appropriated for by name herein, in which, in the part to be improved, or in the improvement, any corporation or individual has any proprietary interest, or on which stream or improvement any tolls are or may be collected, until such proprietary interest is surrendered to the United States.

Mr. PAGE. I make the point of order on the substitute just read, that it is not germane to the paragraph to which I have offered my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary, under the rule, that the amendment should be germane to the paragraph under consideration; otherwise it would be in the power of the Chair to dictate the order in which provisions should be inserted. The rule is, it should be germane to the bill.

Mr. PAGE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his amendment for the present and take some other opportunity of offering it.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I have no objection. I withdraw the substitute for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. PAGE. The committee will observe my amendment makes a general provision, while the proviso in the bill is a special one.

The question being taken on Mr. PAGE's amendment, there were—ayes 63, noes 68.

Mr. PAGE. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PAGE and Mr. REAGAN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 70.

Mr. PAGE. I insist on a quorum. Let us have a full vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will continue their count.

The count was resumed, and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 84.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I now offer the amendment which I withdrew a few moments ago.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph the following:

No money appropriated by this act shall be expended in the improvement of any stream, or part thereof, notwithstanding the same be designated and appropriated for by name herein, in which, in the part to be improved, or in the improvement, any corporation or individual has any proprietary interest, or on which stream or improvement any tolls are or may be collected, until such proprietary interest is surrendered to the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON. Let us vote it down.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 46, noes 82.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. UPDEGRAFF, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. REAGAN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 43, noes 111.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Improving Raritan River, New Jersey, $25,000; of which sum $20,000 shall be expended on rocks at Whitehead Sand Dock, and $5,000 at South Channel, between Crab Island and South Amboy.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I offer as an amendment to come in at the close of the paragraph just read, what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 58 insert:

No money appropriated by this act shall be expended in the improvement of any stream, notwithstanding the same be designated and appropriated for by name herein: Provided, The object be of a local character or the use be merely local and not of general benefit to the States.

Mr. VANCE. I desire to ask the Chair if that amendment has not been substantially voted on before by the committee?

Mr. CLYMER. Oh, no; it has not.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment substantially the same may have been voted on by the committee, but it is not exactly the same proposition, and the Chair will submit it.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. This paragraph appropriates $25,000 for the Raritan River, in New Jersey. From the best information I can obtain the length of this stream that is at all navigable is about twelve miles. The object of this improvement is certainly a purely local object. The paragraph as I have said appropriates $25,000. The amount necessary to complete the project as reported by the engineers at page 517 of the report, is $2,093,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if this section becomes a law without this amendment it involves the expenditure of over two million dollars or else this appropriation is of no use and no consequence. Taking the whole bill and judging the whole bill by this appropriation and the consequences which follow it, the passage of the bill as it now stands without amendment involves the appropriation by Congress at one time or another of the amount of $690,000,000 or else the appropriations in the bill are of no value.

I have endeavored to ascertain upon what principle this bill was drawn. I have not been able to ascertain it. I would like to have had some limits defined in some place or in some manner for these appropriations. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] who spoke the other day here in the committee, a member of the Committee on Commerce, and speaking for it, I doubt not, made a quotation from Judge Story, volume 2, page 162, in which he says:

The only limitations upon the power are those prescribed by the terms of the Constitution, that the objects shall be for the common defense or the general welfare of the Union. The true test is whether the object be of a local character and local use, or whether it be of general benefit to the States. If it be purely local Congress cannot constitutionally appropriate money for the object. But if the benefit be general, it matters not whether in point of locality it be in one State or several; whether it be of large or of small extent, its nature and character determine the right, and Congress may appropriate money in aid of it.

Now, if this be the rule, if the constitutional power of Congress to appropriate money for this purpose is properly defined in the extract I have read, then the amendment which I have had the honor to offer simply confines these appropriations within the just constitutional power of Congress.

Mr. ROBESON. I agree with the general propositions presented by my friend from Iowa, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF;] but he has struck the wrong stream this time. [Great laughter.] The Raritan River is the stream into which the Delaware and Raritan Canal debouches at a point a few miles from the mouth of the river. Over the part of that stream to be improved by this appropriation floats all the water commerce between the metropolitan city of New York and the great manufacturing city of Philadelphia; and over that stream, starting from New York, floats the water commerce to the Chesapeake Bay, to Baltimore, to Washington, and to the South. Therefore, if there be a stream in the country that is not local in its character it is the stream which carries tide-water navigation furthest from New York toward Philadelphia, and is connected with the inland interests of the West and the agricultural section of the South. That is all I have to say about this particular appropriation.

Mr. WILSON. And that is a good speech. [Laughter.]

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, and it was not agreed to upon a division—ayes 24, noes not counted.

Mr. COX. I move to amend the paragraph just read by adding that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no money shall be appropriated by this act for any stream where any corporate company is authorized by any State law to collect tolls or boomage.

Mr. COX. We had a vote a few moments ago on a proposition very similar to this, but we had not at that time the advantage of being able to discuss the proposition offered by the gentleman across the way.

Now, this House may not know, and the Committee on Commerce may not know, that there has been and is now a custom under the law of some States, the State of West Virginia, for instance, of allowing corporate companies to collect tolls or boomage upon certain streams, while the United States Government has been all the time paying out money from the General Treasury for the benefit of improvements on these rivers where such tolls have been collected.

I desire now to call the attention of the House to Elk River, for instance, which is put down in the Centennial Gazetteer of the United States as a tributary of the Great Kanawha, in West Virginia. It is there stated that Elk River rises in Rich Mountain, Randolph County, and flows through Braxton, Clay, and Kanawha counties. It does not flow into the Ohio River at all, but as a tributary of the Great Kanawha. On this Elk River are floated down logs; there is a sort of push-pole navigation, I imagine, as well as raft navigation.

By the provisions of chapter 74 "An act to incorporate the Elk River Land Improvement, Manufacturing and Booming Company," passed by the Legislature of West Virginia February 27, 1869, certain corporators are authorized to subscribe for stock, to form a corporate company, and to erect booms on Elk River. By the eighth section of that act they are authorized to construct booms, with or without piers, as may be necessary for the purpose of stopping and securing logs, masts, spars, and other timber, and to charge and collect tolls and boomage on saw-logs or other timber as may be secured in their booms by warps, wedges, &c.

So also in respect to another river for the improvement of which this Government has been paying large sums of money. I have here an "act to incorporate the Elk River Navigation Company," passed March 4, 1868, by the Legislature of West Virginia. We have here all the proofs, which the Committee on Commerce did not have, that this is a company for collecting tolls on the various articles transported down that river, such as crude and refined oil, empty oil barrels, malt and spirituous liquors, flour, timber, logs, lumber of all kinds, staves and headings, wood and tan-bark, coal and coke, &c. This company is authorized to impose certain taxes upon such articles for lockage, steamboats, barges, &c., and those tolls are collected by a company of private individuals incorporated by the laws of West Virginia. And all this time Congress has been making contributions for the improvement of the navigation of that river, while private individuals have been making money out of such improvements.

Mr. WILSON. You are mistaken about that.

Mr. SPARKS. There is the law; the gentleman has read the law.

Mr. FRYE. I would call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to this: that for a great many years we have been improving New York Harbor, and there is no toll taken on any river in this country so outrageous, so unjust, and so destructive to public interests as the compulsory pilotage enforced in New York Harbor.

Mr. COX. Except perhaps your navigation laws, which will not allow people to buy ships at pleasure. The only things that are obstructed by the legislation which the gentleman favors are ships and obscene literature.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KENNA rose.

Mr. REAGAN. Allow me a moment.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to reply to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from New York that it would be safest to strike out the word "boomage" from his amendment, because that is provided for in many places separate from the navigation of the stream.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman favor my amendment if I strike out the word "boomage?"

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know about that.

Mr. COX. I will strike that word out, if the gentleman will agree to vote for my amendment.

Mr. KENNA addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. My opposition to this bill is not factious. When the effort was made to put the bill on its passage under a supension of the rules I resisted it for the very reason that I desired the bill to be brought before us in such a way that we could amend and debate it. It is now before us in that shape, and as time is precious, I hope our friends here will cease any further factious opposition, and will seek by amending the bill to put it in such form as will command the sanction of the majority of this House. I shall be glad to see it so amended and guarded that I may be able to vote for it myself.

About two-thirds of its provisions meet my approbation. I am in favor of liberal appropriations for all navigable rivers, especially so with regard to the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Missouri, and its other great tributaries. I am in favor of improving those great water lines of transportation as a means of competition with railroad monopoly. After we have sufficiently improved the large navigable streams we may then address our attention to, or at least consider the propriety of, improving the small streams which gentlemen seem to regard as so important.

I wish to say further that the amendment of the gentleman from New York is in my opinion right in principle; and I hope it will be applied to every stream upon which there is a private corporation levying tolls on commerce. I do not know but that in justice to those who own such works some provision should be inserted for condemning and purchasing their improvements as was done in regard to the Louisville and Portland Canal, on the Ohio River.

I hold in my hand a communication, which I have received since this bill came into the House, from a gentleman in the West, in which I find the fact asserted that on one of these rivers of West Virginia—the Monongahela I believe—there is a corporation enjoying the monopoly of levying toll on every bushel of coal and every pound of freight passing over the river. I am informed that 48,000,000 bushels of coal came down that river during the last season into the Ohio River and Mississippi, which was taxed by that corporation. Now, I regard this as wrong; it is against the best interests of the coal region in West Virginia as well as the consumers of coal.

It has been asserted on this floor that similar corporations controlling navigation exist on the Great and Little Kanawhas of West Virginia as well as a number of other streams in other States.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will not be adopted—at least not in the broad language in which it now stands. If it should be adopted in the form now pending, some of the most important public works provided for by the bill will be deprived of any benefit of the appropriation. Some years ago the Legislature of the State of Texas incorporated a company which was authorized to clear out the obstructions in Galveston Bay, to make a ship-channel, and to charge toll. The necessities of our commerce were such that this measure had to be adopted. The Government did not make any provision for improving that channel, and the State had to resort to this objectionable method of doing so. Now, since that time, the Congress of the United States in the river and harbor appropriation bill have taken up that work and gone on and spent $100,000 or $200,000 on it already. There is a contract with that company for the surrender of its charter, filed and accepted by the Government with the Secretary of War, on the completion of the work by the Government of a depth of twelve feet and over. If this amendment is adopted it stops that whole thing. I tried to express to the House the other day the necessity of going on to complete that work as rapidly as possible. That is one of the great reasons why our people are so anxious to have it finished.

Mr. COX. What work is the gentleman speaking of?

Mr. MILLS. I am speaking of the work in Galveston Bay on the ship-channel. When that work is done, then the payment of toll ceases and vessels engaged in the coasting and other trade can come with their cargoes, from whatever port they may hail, to Houston and deliver them without toll. They cannot do so now without paying toll.

If this amendment is adopted, Mr. Chairman, without any sort of restriction, this whole work stops and that toll is fixed on us for all time to come. I therefore, in case that amendment is adopted, will move to amend, and I hope my amendment will be accepted, by adding the words "except where the Government has an agreement for the surrender of said company's charter when the Government's work is completed."

Mr. COX. I accept that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. COX. I demand a division on that motion.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 114, noes 21.

Several MEMBERS. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again state to gentlemen on the floor who fail to vote they thereby obstruct the business of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. Who makes the point that no quorum has voted?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule says distinctly and expressly whenever it shall appear in committee there is no quorum the Chair shall cause the roll to be called, &c.

Mr. CALKINS. The committee can rise without a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. Under what rule?

Mr. CALKINS. There is no rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule says whenever—that is in all cases—whenever it shall appear in Committee of the Whole there is no quorum present, the Chair shall cause the roll to be called, &c.

Mr. CALKINS. That does not apply when a motion is made that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the point in reference to which the Chair asked the gentleman to cite the rule.

Mr. CALKINS. There is no rule, because no rule is required.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule expressly provides how the committee shall get a quorum. Whenever it shall appear in Committee of the Whole there is no quorum present the Chair shall cause the roll to be called, &c.

Mr. CALKINS. I admit that whenever the business of the committee is obstructed by the fact of no quorum appearing then the roll should be called; but the motion to rise is equivalent to a motion to adjourn, and as the House can adjourn without a quorum so it can rise without a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever the Committee of the Whole House finds itself without a quorum the chairman shall cause the roll to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, &c.

The CHAIRMAN. That is sufficient. The gentleman will observe the language of the rule is broad and comprehensive. "Whenever the Committee of the Whole House finds itself without a quorum," &c.

Mr. CALKINS. The Chair will observe that only applies to the business of the committee. Now, this is a motion to rise, which is equivalent to a motion to adjourn in the House. Suppose you find yourself without a quorum in the House to adjourn, or suppose you find yourself without a quorum on a motion to rise, if we must have a quorum before we can rise or adjourn, we could neither rise nor adjourn without a quorum.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If the roll is called the committee then rises to report the fact to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. Under the rule just read if no quorum votes the committee rises at once and goes into the House and reports that fact. If there be no objection the Chair will again take the vote by division.

There was no objection.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 138, noes 25.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. REAGAN. I move the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House; and, pending that motion, I move all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in one minute.

The latter motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill; and, by order of the House, all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto is limited to one minute.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I withdraw the formal amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on Mr. COX's amendment, as modified.

Mr. MILLS. Let the amendment be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no money shall be appropriated by this act for any stream where any corporate company is authorized by any State law to collect toll or boomage, except where the company has an agreement for the surrender of said company's charter when the Government's work is completed.

Mr. CONGER. Has the minute for debate been consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. Not yet.

Mr. CONGER. In the improvement of some rivers where a company has been organized to build dams and make slack-water navigation, and above the works of the company the Government has already appropriated money—and that work is now going on, I think, in Virginia or Kentucky—subject to the law that no tolls shall be charged for that part of the river made navigable by the improvements of the United States. That is an old provision of an old law, and those interested in it in those States perhaps ought to see if this will violate that law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON. Let us vote it down.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 37, noes 114.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Charlotte, New York, repair of piers, $2,500.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I offer the following amendment:

In lines 63 and 64 strike out the words "repair of piers, $2,500," and insert "rebuilding piers, $10,000."

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in connection with this amendment that there is no estimate of the engineers for the work for which this amount is appropriated in this bill, namely, the repair of piers. There is an estimate for the rebuilding of the piers at Charlotte of $40,000, of which $10,000 is needed this year, but none for their repair. It was originally estimated that the completion of these piers would cost $45,000. In 1880 $5,000 was appropriated for that work, as the Engineer's report shows. Nothing could be done with so small a sum. I do not offer this amendment because I expect it to pass. It is foreordained by the Committee on Commerce that no amendment shall be made to this bill. The chairman of the committee has given orders to his retainers that no amendment shall be allowed. I would ask no man to vote one dollar by this amendment if upon the merits of the case and upon a close examination of the whole question it was not warranted and fully demanded. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

But, sir, it is for us upon this floor to decide what we shall do when the facts are submitted to us. The statement has been made upon this floor that gentlemen who oppose this bill do so because they have failed to get as large appropriations for their localities as they desired. This is entirely untrue, at least so far as I am concerned. I did not go before the Commerce Committee at all. I did not speak to any member of it in reference to any appropriation; I asked for nothing, and I got all I asked. I left the committee to act upon their official responsibility to this House and to the country. I took it for granted that in the formation of a bill of this character they would be guided by higher motives than mere local or State interests.

Now, what is this appropriation for in this case? For the rebuilding of the rotten piers of a harbor which collected during the last year $102,000 of customs, and it is estimated that during the present year it will collect $150,000. The piers are rotten and worthless; the engineers report that they must be rebuilt, and it should be done within a short time. Last year the committee gave that work $5,000. Of course nothing could be done within that sum toward rebuilding the piers. It will take nine years to do the work at $5,000 a year. It is absurd to think of doing that. This year they propose to give by this bill $2,500. At that rate it will take eighteen years to complete the work, and the first part will be destroyed before the last part is finished. This district collects more customs and pays more to the Treasury from that source than the entire State of West Virginia, or Texas, or Delaware, or North Corolina, or than the State of South Carolina, or Georgia, or the State of Alabama, or than the State of Wisconsin. This single port alone beats these entire States in the amount of customs revenue it collects, and yet the Committee on Commerce say they have acted upon "equitable principles." They refuse to give more than the small pittance of $2,500 to this work when the engineer recommends $10,000 to rebuild the piers, and when such rebuilding has become absolutely necessary. There are over eight hundred thousand dollars of internal revenue collected in this Rochester district.

The number of vessels which cleared from this port in the last fiscal year is six hundred and three, and their tonnage is 139,112 tons. The number of vessels entered at that port during the same period is five hundred and ninety. There were one hundred and eighty arrivals and departures of vessels which were not entered or cleared. The articles of commerce are lumber, live stock, grain, iron-ore, coal, and hay. There are two immense coal-chutes at that point and the shipment of coal to the Canadas is great and increasing each year. [Cries of "Vote!"] Now, gentlemen may call "vote" as much as they please. There will be no vote until I am through.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask what right has the State of Texas to take $750,000 of the money, 70 per cent. of which is received from the State of New York, when she only contributes, customs and internal revenue all combined, the sum of $389,000, less than one-fourth of 1 per cent. of the Government revenues, when Texas refuses one of the finest harbors of New York the small sum to do necessary work, and work that is absolutely indispensable to save what is already there and which the engineers report should be done and done speedily.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to ask a parliamentary question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to know whether we can have a separate vote on the amendment to strike out and to insert. As the gentleman from New York thinks $2,500 will not do any good, suppose we strike it out altogether.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, in response to the remarks of the gentleman from New York in which he alleges that there has been no estimate for this work and that the amount appropriated is insignificant in comparison to the needs of the harbor there, I will simply read the report of the engineers as to what has been done and what is to be done. They say:

A number of repairs costing about thirteen hundred dollars were made to both the east and west piers wherever the timbers and planks were decayed or broken. The harbor is in good condition. The appropriation of $5,000 made by the act of June 14, 1880, will be applied to the rebuilding of the piers, the estimated cost of which was $45,000 as given in the last annual report.

And there is no recommendation whatever to appropriate, as the gentleman suggests, for the rebuilding of the piers.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. There was a recommendation last year that the piers be rebuilt and that it be done in five years at a cost of $45,000, and the Engineer does report that $10,000 should be expended this year in rebuilding of the piers. I quote the Engineer's words:

|---|---|
| Amount (estimated) required for completion of rebuilding piers, existing project | $40,000 |
| Amount that can be profitably expended in fiscal year ending June 30, 1882 | 10,000 |

There is no mistake about that. The Engineer says the piers are rotten, and should be rebuilt. The repairs which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] referred to were paid out of an old appropriation. The $5,000 appropriated in 1880 is untouched, and is a part of the $45,000 of the original estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 120.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I offer, then, the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of War shall not expend any money appropriated by this act in any State in excess of the net receipts of customs and internal revenue received from such State in the last fiscal year.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. This is an act to sequestrate a portion of the revenues of the United States and distribute it among the States. There should be some equitable method of making the distribution. I know of no more equal way than to take the amount the States contribute to said revenues and make the distribution ratably on that basis. The river and harbor appropriation is for the benefit of commerce, and the customs being a tax on commerce, the amount of customs each State pays should be taken as the basis.

I have already said there were $102,000 of customs received at the port of Genesee in the last fiscal year, and that sum will probably be increased to $150,000 this year. Paying that large revenue, this bill grants $2,500 for the rebuilding of piers which will cost $45,000. In the last fiscal year West Virginia collects $737 of customs and $311,414 internal revenue. Allowing for cost of collection the net sum is probably not over $250,000. This river and harbor bill gives to that State $306,000. So West Virginia takes from the Treasury $56,000 more than she contributes to it—the Federal Government pays all the cost of its officers and other expenses in West Virginia and gives that State a bonus of $56,000 besides.

Texas pays into the Treasury a gross sum of $131,413 for customs and $258,321 internal revenue, aggregating $389,734, and takes out of the Treasury by this bill the sum of $750,000. New Jersey collects $10,949 of customs, and takes by this bill $266,000. Delaware collects $17,494 of customs, and takes out of the Treasury by this river and harbor bill $66,500. Virginia collects $62,312 of customs, and takes out of the Treasury by this bill $262,000. North Carolina collects $47,214 of customs, and takes $68,500 by this bill. South Carolina collects $67,097 of customs, and gets $232,000 by this bill. Georgia collects $76,286 customs, and gets $156,000 by this bill. Alabama collects $31,365 of customs, and gets $135,000 by this bill. Wisconsin collects $77,254 of customs, and takes $268,000 by this bill. These are a few samples.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a commerce bill, and it is a bill that should bear some proportion to that portion of revenue which is derived from commerce, that is, the customs revenue in the several States. The money appropriated by this bill should be divided, as it seems to me, only in proportion to the amount of customs which the several States pay if there is to be any equitable division at all. If we are to put this money into the trout streams of West Virginia, and mud streams of Maryland, the amount should correspond to what is received in the way of customs from those States. And the amounts which they pay into the Treasury should furnish a limit to the amounts they draw out. This seems a very plain proposition, and this amendment should be adopted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. VAN VOORHIS, there were—ayes 9, noes 144.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Flushing Bay, New York, $10,000.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph just read, namely, these words: "Improving Flushing Bay, New York, $10,000."

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I do not know what Representative from my State is interested in the two lines of the bill covered by my amendment; but I wish to say that I cannot allow him exclusively to represent the interests of Flushing Bay. As one of the Representatives of the State of New York, and as representing a city that has some commerce in Flushing Bay, I have a right to speak for that locality. I want to say it is not possible to improve Flushing Bay. Mark the language of the bill as it reads: "Improving Flushing Bay."

There is no more beautiful bay lit up by the sunshine of the early morning or the moonshine of the evening. Look at its beautiful shores washed by the waters of the Atlantic Ocean, as its wild waves sport and play with the Long Island coast, its limpid and pure waters showing the Little Neck clams feeding upon the sands in this beautiful bay. Doubtless there are some of the citizens of my city that carry on a thriving trade in these succulent Little Neck and other clams, and, representing these constituents, I would not have this bay improved so as to destroy that commerce.

This paragraph to be stricken out by my amendment is perhaps not worse than some other paragraphs in this bill to which reference might be made. It will be observed that the paragraph does not refer to the improvement of the navigation of this bay. It may refer to the improvement of its views or of its appearance to the stranger. There may be some country seat located upon the sloping banks of Flushing Bay that is to be improved by this section. There is certainly this obscurity in the language.

I ask the attention of the committee to the fact that some few years ago there was an appropriation made in the river and harbor bill for the improvement of Rondout Harbor, the harbor of my city. The work was carried on; I will not say it is carried on to completion to-day, but to such a state of perfection that there is not a single man in my city that will father the plans by which that money was expended; there is not one single man who will say he consented to that plan. There may possibly be some individual owner of land or some incorporated owners of land that that improvement was calculated to benefit, and I hope they will some time realize the full advantage of the money laid out in Rondout Harbor.

I can give here as I gave a year ago, standing in my place, in the minute of time allotted to me for a speech upon the river and harbor bill then pending, the testimony of navigators and owners of vessels that, on the whole, the money expended in Rondout Harbor and the Hudson River, instead of being for the benefit of commerce affords to-day an obstruction to the commerce of the State, and the money instead of being merely sunk in the bottom of the river has been used to destroy and injure the value of the river as a navigable stream. The newspapers and people of my district, so far as they have spoken upon the subject, are opposed to this bill. They do not simply oppose this paragraph, they oppose these appropriations, come they as single spies or in battalions.

It is a misfortune that the subject of improving the rivers and harbors and the internal commerce of the country, a very beneficent thing if properly managed, is not under the regulation of law, not controlled or governed by statute or plan, but rests alone and solely in the discretion of the members of a committee. I will say no ill word of any person. I no not wish to speak ill of any member of this committee. They are all human like myself and like every other Representative. They can yield to pressure, to urging, to allurement of individuals; they yield to pressure of interest; and we find that all the appropriations that are contained in this bill are not made solely to benefit the commerce of the country. [Here the hammer fell.] Mr. Chairman, I had not completed what I had to say upon this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COVERT. Mr. Chairman, while my colleague has made the statement that he did not know in whose district Flushing Bay was located, he has still evidenced a good knowledge of the situation and the character of that bay; and when he describes it as a beautiful sheet of water he does but simple justice to the locality he thus criticises. I want to congratulate my colleague upon the ability which he displayed when he made the statement he did that this bay could not be improved, and when he criticised the language employed by the Commerce Committee in formulating this paragraph of the pending bill. I want to congratulate my colleague upon his ability thus to "teach Cæsar the art of war." He criticises, in the first place, the expressed judgment of General Newton and the Chief of Engineers, as communicated to this House in the official announcement and communication of the Secretary of War bearing upon this subject.

The Chief of Engineers differs in opinion with my colleague, and expressly says that this bay can be improved. I set his opinion against that of my respected colleague. General Newton, who had charge of the improvement in question, says that the improvement is necessary in order to insure the future successful navigation of that bay. The committee have employed the customary and formal phraseology only in formulating this paragraph. This does not require defense. My colleague speaks of this proposed improvement as being urged simply by individual property-owners. I answer that the very first step leading up to this work was the adoption by the trustees of the village of Flushing of a resolution asking that this improvement be made by the Federal Congress. The village thus urging this action has a population of nearly eight thousand people. The town directly benefited has within its limits fully fifteen thousand of population. Immediately adjoining the village and town of Flushing is a rich, populous, and flourishing back country, whose people are directly affected by the work of improvement contemplated by this paragraph of the pending bill. I have not the time, Mr. Chairman, to give in detail the items going to show the amount of business involved in this application for the improvement of Flushing Bay. These items and full information relating thereto were given to the committee when I had the privilege of presenting this matter to them before the completion of this bill, and it was upon this information thus given in detail, I assume, that this item was inserted in the pending act.

I want to tell my colleague [Mr. LOUNSBERY] something that his residence away up in Ulster County, far removed from the locality in question, has probably prevented him from fully understanding, that is, that Flushing Bay forms at times a place of refuge for vessels navigating Long Island Sound in seasons of storm and of danger. And to this extent and for this reason the commerce of this part of the country has been benefited by the improvements thus far made in the bay, and will be further benefited if the improvements are continued.

This is not the first appropriation made for this improvement. Comparatively small amounts of money have been previously appropriated, and these amounts have been judiciously expended by the engineer in charge of this work. The pending contemplated appropriation is for deepening and widening the channel of the bay. The engineer notifies this House and the Committee on Commerce that the continuation of this improvement is an absolute necessity. The Committee on Commerce did but their duty, perhaps I may say only a part of their duty, in recommending to this House the adoption of the small appropriation contained in the pending bill for the continuation of this much needed improvement. My time has expired. I can only say, in conclusion, that it would be an act of absolute injustice to adopt the amendment of my colleague to strike out this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted upon the pending amendment.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. Under the circumstances, I ask permission of the committee to withdraw the amendment I have offered and to substitute one in its place, to insert after the word "improving," in line 67, the words "the navigation of;" so that it will read "improving the navigation of Flushing Bay." And I desire to be heard a moment or two on that amendment in answer to my colleague who has just taken his seat, [Mr. COVERT.]

I wish to say that I was entirely unaware that my motion in the first place affected his interest in any way, for I have the most tender feelings of respect toward that gentleman. Representing as I do to some extent Flushing Bay, I want, however, to warn him that there is great danger in accepting an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of that bay by diking the entrance of the bay, as is proposed by the plan of the work recommended by the engineers. May I call the attention of my colleague to the history of Amsterdam?

Mr. COX. Or any other "dam." [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUNSBERY. Some gentlemen want to introduce other "dams." I refer to Amsterdam in no such profane spirit. It was once a city controlling the East India trade and the commerce of the world. By appropriations and by engineering and diking Amsterdam engineered and diked away its commerce to other places. By the peculiar system of engineering adopted at Amsterdam, it has now become a harbor where it is necessary for vessels to be locked up by means of the tide-locks in order to reach the city.

Now, let me say generally on this matter of appropriations for improving the rivers and harbors—and I am not speaking my own opinion alone—engineers as well as members on this floor differ as to the propriety of a certain method of improving rivers and harbors; but I have been told by engineers, and there seems to be reason in it, that if there be appropriated and expended such sums as are demanded for completing the improvements in progress in the channel at Hell Gate by removing obstructions there, the bar in the Narrows, through which channel now passes all the foreign commerce which the city of New York receives will be raised eighteen inches above its present height.

If gentlemen will look for a moment at the matter they will see that if the channel of Hell Gate be opened so that an additional amount of water from New York Harbor will flow out through it, the channel at the Narrows will be relieved from discharging a certain amount of the water from New York Bay upon each receding tide, and will adapt itself to the new condition of things. There will be needed there a smaller channel for the discharge of water from New York Bay through the Narrows, and thus a large portion of the foreign shipping now coming to New York through that channel will be driven away from the port, and New York and Flushing Bay, and all these beautiful and fair places which gentlemen desire to improve by this bill, will be stripped of the commerce which they now possess.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I desire, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. REAGAN. If debate cannot now be closed, I will move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this paragraph.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I desire to be heard.

Mr. CONGER. I think if the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] can be heard, we can then get a vote.

Mr. REAGAN. If we can have a vote after the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] has spoken, I do not want the committee to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion that the committee rise is withdrawn.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I have no desire to obstruct or delay these proceedings. I rise in my character as a representative sworn to the performance of my duty, to call attention to one chronic feature of this discussion. That feature may or may not be creditable to us as intelligent, consciencious representatives of the people. Let every man answer that question to his own conscience.

There are in this bill three hundred and fifty more or less explicit single appropriations. I proved to a demonstration the other day, after the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. REAGAN] had stated to the House and to the country that he had examined every one of these specific appropriations, that neither he nor any other member of this committee knew where Sumpawamus Bay was, within fifty miles, forty miles, or thirty miles. The gentleman said that it was within the city of New York. Now, he might with as much propriety and as much fidelity to his previous assertions have said that it was in Japan. [Laughter.]

I desire to inquire why it is that every one of these three hundred and fifty specific appropriations is assumed to be perfect? Has the millennium dawned on the Committee on Commerce? Are they competent to come here with three hundred and fifty streams to improve, and to say that every one of their propositions are perfect? Why is it they have votes enough every time to say that you shall neither strike out nor put in a word? [Laughter.] I ask that question; and I put it to the consciences of two hundred and ninety-three sworn Representatives, is that judicial, thoroughly fair, considerate legislation? I say it is not; and if I had the power I would defeat this bill though the consequences of its failure should be an extra session of Congress. I believe that this measure involves so much viciousness that it is more important to defeat it than it has been to defeat any other appropriation bill that has been brought before Congress in ten years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LOUNSBERY.]

Mr. LOUNSBERY. With the consent of the Committee of the Whole, I will withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Great Sodus Bay, New York, $5,000.

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the lines just read, and insert the following instead thereof:

Improving harbor at Great Sodus Bay, New York, including dredging of channel, $20,000.

Mr. Chairman, the harbor of Great Sodus Bay is on the south side of Lake Ontario about half way between Niagara and the Saint Lawrence River. It is a harbor five miles in length and three in width, having a depth of water from eighteen to thirty-two feet. There is not an inch of this harbor that is not navigable. A sand-bar formed across its mouth, which some years ago the Government opened by digging through a channel twelve feet in depth. This channel is protected by two piers, one of them fourteen hundred feet in length; and there is an opening between the piers five hundred feet wide, through which at any time, in any storm—no matter from what direction the wind may blow—a vessel can enter.

It is a harbor whose commercial importance is yearly increasing. It is the terminus of a railroad recently constructed uniting the coal regions of Pennsylvania with the lumber regions of Canada. Appreciating the importance of this harbor over two thousand persons, residing all the way from Chicago to New York, have sent petitions here asking that $20,000 may be voted to open this channel to the depth necessary to allow a large-sized vessel with a full cargo to enter. The reason of the shallowness of the channel is not owing to the fact that the channel has filled up, but is because of the lowness of the water in Lake Ontario last year and several years preceding. The channel does not fill up. Twenty thousand dollars will complete the work; and if the committee will allow that amount to be used for this work the channel will be deepened, and this will be made a permanent improvement that will last for all time to come.

The Government maintains at this port two beacon-lights, saying practically to all navigators on the lake, "Here is a harbor of refuge and safety." The petition which I have here says it is the best harbor of safety and refuge upon any of the great lakes.

The petition asking that this harbor may be opened is signed by all the ship-owners, captains, and freighters, and by a large number of persons interested in marine insurance companies. It seems to me it would be wise for Congress to vote now this appropriation and complete the improvement, so that these beacon lights may not lure to their destruction navigators of these waters who attempt to enter this port in a dark night and during a storm. Last year two vessels were grounded and some lives were lost. There is no other harbor of refuge nearer than the Saint Lawrence River, except the harbor at Little Sodus, which has across its mouth a sand-bar which must be removed. I submit, therefore, that the appropriation proposed by my amendment should be made, and this harbor dug to the depth necessary to allow vessels of the largest class fully laden to enter.

Mr. REAGAN. The Engineeer Department recommended an appropriation of $10,000 for this work. The Committee on Commerce has recommended $5,000, 50 per cent. of the estimate, which is above the average allowed by us on such works.

Mr. CAMP. Do not the engineers report that $20,000 will complete the work?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; they report that $17,000 will complete it. But they ask for only $10,000 for this year. We have given one-half of that amount, which is more than we did for most other works.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CAMP, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 53, noes 84.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Little Sodus Bay, New York, $7,500.

Mr. CAMP. I move to amend by striking out in the clause just read "$7,500" and inserting "$20,000," so as to read:

Improving harbor at Little Sodus Bay, New York, $20,000.

Mr. Chairman, the duties collected at this port have increased from $2,500 to $3,000 in 1877, to $47,000 or $50,000 in the last year. In the last river and harbor bill, as in this, the Committee on Commerce reported a very small sum for the improvement of this harbor or the opening of its channel, but the Senate put on an amendment giving us $25,000, and a conference committee allowed it to go through at $20,000, which was the amount appropriated last year for this work. The estimate of the Engineer Department for the work is $60,000, so that if $20,000 can be appropriated this year and $20,000 next year, the harbor will be completed, and will be in perfect order.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Olcott, New York, $3,000.

Mr. SPARKS. I make a point of order on the clause just read. I submit that there is no law authorizing the appropriation. It is scarcely necessary to read the rule:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

This does not indicate that it is a continuation of any former improvement. There is no law authorizing it.

The CHAIRMAN. What does the gentleman say of its being a general appropriation bill within the third clause of the rule?

Mr. SPARKS. I understand it to be such general appropriation bill. The river and harbor appropriation bill has always been considered as one of the general appropriation bills.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not wish to discuss that point at this time. This is an old work provided for by law during many years. It is a continuation of work already in progress as is shown by this report. Appropriations were made for it for nine years. None was made for it last year, but the estimate for it recites appropriations heretofore made for it. It is in continuance of work already in progress. I do not wish to argue the question raised by the gentleman from Illinois at this time, as that question does not arise on this proposition. No point of order can be made against it as it is continuation of a work already in progress.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. It seems to me that a better argument can be made against the point of order than is made by the gentleman from Texas. If this is to be considered a general appropriation bill covered by the rule, then none of the appropriations are in order and the point can be made against every paragraph, because there is no enactment of Congress having reference to any of these appropriations covered by this bill. I do not deny there have been expenditures at points where these paragraphs propose to extend the work of improvement, but those appropriations were not by law. Of course the work was authorized to be done, but the point I make, Mr. Chairman, is that no system of internal improvements has been regulated by statute or recognized by the law. The entire question depends on the volition of this Appropriations Committee, and has been so considered from time to time. It is not a general appropriation bill. It is special; it is volition; it is discretion. It has not been nor is there any purpose to have it controlled by law, by any method, by any plan, by any process other than simple discretion, volition, or will of the committee and nothing else. That answers, it seems to me, the proposition that this is not a general appropriation bill.

Mr. ROBESON. If the question——

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from New Jersey will allow me,

I will say that this report shows that $115,000 has been heretofore spent on this work.

Mr. CLYMER. Does the gentleman from Illinois still insist on his point of order?

Mr. SPARKS. What is that?

Mr. CLYMER. Does the gentleman still insist on his point of order? The understanding is that it is not clear and sharp in reference to this particular paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois and likewise that of the gentleman from New York to the fact there are two clauses of the rule. The first relates to expenditures previously authorized by law, and the next to continuation of works already in progress, and the Chair understands the gentleman from Texas to say this work is already in progress, and has been for eight or nine years.

Mr. SPARKS. I do not understand the gentleman from Texas to assert that, as I presume that is not really the fact, although in times past there may have been appropriations for this harbor. I do not question that; but that was not known to me when I made the point. I do not hold, however, that this cannot be called an appropriation in continuation of work already begun. This is an independent appropriation for the improvement of Olcott Harbor, and not connected or hinged on to any appropriation heretofore made.

The CHAIRMAN. Will it or not be a continuation of work already done or in progress?

Mr. SPARKS. I would understand if an appropriation for a new harbor to-day should be made that would be an appropriation which would not come within the range of this rule. Unless the appropriation be for completing the work heretofore begun it would not come under the rule. Where the harbor has been appropriated for in years past and subsequently an appropriation is sought for the same work, that certainly cannot be considered as any continuation of work already in progress. This is as much an independent proposition as though it were an entirely new work. On this question of new appropriations in the general appropriation bill I think we may as well settle it now as at any other time. I am now prepared to make whatever remarks I have to make on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is anxious to hear what gentlemen have to say on this question of order, as it may become an important one in the consideration of this bill. Therefore he requests gentlemen on the floor to stop conversing in order he may be able to hear what the gentleman is saying.

Mr. ROBESON. But, Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois made a point of order, and he desires to state the grounds for it.

Mr. ROBESON. If the question is as to general or special appropriation bills, then I desire to be heard. If not, I do not care to go on.

Mr. REAGAN. I will make a statement as to the facts. There was not an appropriation for this work last year. The report on this is short, and will show the Chair precisely the position of the work, and I will read it:

> Nothing has been done here during the year, there being no funds available, and the condition of the harbor is the same as given in the last annual report.
> The scheme for the improvement of this harbor was adopted by an appropriation, in 1867, to provide for the construction of parallel piers out to the 12-foot curve and the excavation of a channel twelve feet deep between them. The piers have been carried out to the 9-foot curve and the channel deepened to about ten feet, at a cost of $115,000.

Mr. SPARKS. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, in this connection, that from the Engineer's Report it is clearly meant as a continuing appropriation for a continuous work. If the appropriation had been thus worded, "for the continuing of improvements in that harbor," and if amended in that way, it would cover the case and not be subject to the point. I presume the facts are, from the statement made, that it is a continuing appropriation. I am relying for my facts largely on the appropriation bill of last year. Now, as I have said, if the wording of the appropriation here had been to provide for the continuance of work that had been begun, it would have obviated the necessity of the point of order.

Mr. CLYMER. Let me ask the gentleman a question in this connection. I do not think this point, should be decided without a full statement of it, and a clear one to the Chair, because it involves other questions. Suppose you make an appropriation for a public building to be erected under existing law at a certain point, and then you do not make any appropriation for a number of years, and suppose it then becomes necessary either to roof the building or to make some repairs upon it, would it require additional legislation to enable the Committee on Appropriations to bring in a bill for that purpose?

Mr. SPARKS. If my friend will allow me, I will repeat that, as I understand from the reading of the report of the engineers, this is a continuing work, or that appropriations have been made for it heretofore, and this is in pursuance of a plan adopted; and therefore my point of order is not well taken. Believing that to be the case, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to renew the point of order, but I wish to speak upon it before the Chair decides it.

Mr. REAGAN. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that he can discuss the question when it comes up in another form before the committee, so that we can get through as rapidly as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he has not decided the question of order, the gentleman from Illinois having withdrawn it.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Improving harbor at Waddington, New York, $2,500.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I desire to offer the amendment which I send up.

The Clerk read as follows:

> After "dollars," in the eighty-second line, insert "ice-harbor at Dubuque, Iowa, $40,000."

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the Chair has determined that a question of this character is to be regarded as germane to the bill——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has endeavored under the rule, the language of which is clear, to decide that an amendment to be inadmissible must be one not germane to the bill, and not to the particular clause to which it is offered, but to the object of the bill, the general object which it has in view.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. In support of this amendment, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words.

Mr. SPRINGER. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. If the gentleman desires to press the point of order I would prefer he would do it before I waste any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would be better to settle the question of order before entering upon a discussion of the merits of the question. The Chair will be glad to hear a statement of the grounds on which the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois is based.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order on the same ground that my colleague did a few moments ago, that this is a work not authorized by law, and not in continuation of existing work already authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. That being a fact, it would present the direct question whether this is to be considered as a general appropriation bill and governed by the third clause of the twenty-first rule.

Mr. REAGAN. This is new work; and if the question depended upon its being new work there would be no practical difficulty in settling the question of order. I make no objection, however, to settling the question, as suggested by the Chair, at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Has there been a survey ordered for this?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I cannot say that there has been; not that I know of. There has been a survey made, however.

The CHAIRMAN. Under authority of law, the Chair desires to know?

Mr. HENDERSON. Undoubtedly there was a survey made under the law.

The CHAIRMAN. There might have been a survey made by some local authority. The Chair means, of course, under the law of the United States governing such surveys.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. The survey was made by the Engineer Department of the United States.

Mr. REAGAN. Presumably under the general act of 1880 in pursuance of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now hear the statement of the gentleman from Illinois as to his point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand the Chair to ask the gentleman from Iowa to state whether this harbor was surveyed in pursuance of the general law or under a special law for this particular purpose. If it was under the law authorizing the general survey of rivers and harbors, it would not apply to this more than any other work that might have been surveyed and is not already embraced or authorized in the law. But if it was directed by a special law directing the survey of this particular harbor for this particular purpose, then it would have been authorized by law; and that is the point that I am not advised upon and on which I have asked information.

Mr. REAGAN. I stated that the survey had been ordered in the river and harbor bill. All these surveys are made in pursuance of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question the Chair asked the gentleman from Illinois was whether it was under a specific direction that the survey was made for this particular harbor or not.

Mr. REAGAN. If the Chair pleases, I can illustrate this. The specific direction with reference to each particular point is ordinarily contained in the latter part of the river and harbor bill, where it provides for all of these surveys.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the general custom, but wished to inquire whether there was any special act authorizing this survey.

Mr. SPARKS. I hold in my hand the last river and harbor bill, in which provision is made for authorizing the Secretary of War to direct certain surveys of rivers and harbors and estimates. Now, I do not see anything in reference to this harbor in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas says this was done in a bill passed in 1878.

Mr. REAGAN. Perhaps I had better correct myself. I proceeded on the fact that the gentleman from Iowa said he had a survey made under those laws. I have not before me the terms of the bill, to see which act this was in.

Mr. SPARKS. I only know it is not in the last act, that of 1880. But I wanted to say in that connection, were it so, were there an authority given to the Secretary of War to cause these surveys to be made, it does not constitute that sort of authority that would warrant an appropriation. The rule says:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law——

The CHAIRMAN. Or in continuation of appropriations already made.

Mr. SPARKS. Yes.

Unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

Now the survey of a river or the survey of a harbor commences nothing. It is not an appropriation for any improvement. It is simply an experimental investigation to see whether or not an improvement may become necessary. To comply with the rule you must have an appropriation of money for the improvement of the harbor or the river. That is most clearly required, as it strikes me.

Mr. REAGAN. I will correct the statement I made a little while ago, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. SPARKS. I do not care much about that point of the survey; but I would like to hear from the gentleman.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I would like to understand the fact. I wish to ask the chairman whether the point of order is made as to the paragraph at lines 81 and 82, or whether it refers to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa?

The CHAIRMAN. It is made against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I would like the amendment to be reported.

Mr. WARNER. Before the Chair rules on this question I should like to direct his attention to this point: whether an examination or survey for the purpose of determining whether a given work shall be undertaken or not is the commencement of such a work as to warrant the appropriation under this rule.

Mr. KENNA. When by general laws surveys are specifically directed to be made, who is authorized to say this Government intended anything else than to complete the survey and go on with the prosecution of the work? The survey is an essential part of every work that is prosecuted of this kind.

Mr. WARNER. I take it a survey is for the purpose of determining whether a work shall be undertaken, and not the undertaking of that work.

Mr. REAGAN. I have been endeavoring for some moments to get the attention of the Chair. If gentlemen will not be so much in a hurry I will state exactly the position of this question. When I made my statement here before, it was after hearing the gentleman from Iowa. Since that I have examined the report as to the survey. The survey appears to have been made on the authority of a letter addressed by that gentleman to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary directing the Engineer Corps to make the survey; so that it was not done under the authority of any law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LOUNSBERY] has asked to have the pending amendment read. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 82 insert the words "ice-harbor at Dubuque, Iowa, $40,000."

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I desire to be heard on the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The real point to which the Chair would like gentlemen to direct their attention, if the point of order is to be insisted on, is whether a bill making appropriations for rivers and harbors is a general appropriation bill within the meaning of the rules, and must be so treated under the third clause of Rule XXI.

Mr. ROBESON. On that I desire to be heard.

Mr. WARNER. The States are nearly all interested in these appropriations, and the bill is a very general one.

Mr. SPARKS. That was a question under the point of order made by myself some time ago. The decision of it was deferred at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. But it can be deferred no longer.

Mr. SPARKS. I am willing to give my views on it now.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to give mine.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I desire to state the question of fact merely.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa having offered the amendment now desires to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I do not desire to be heard on the point of order, but merely to give the fact; for a correct statement of the fact must precede any intelligent statement of the question of order under discussion.

Mr. SPRINGER. We want to hear what is the fact.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. It appears from the report that in pursuance of a letter addressed by myself to the Secretary of War, accompanied by a large petition of river men and people in the locality of Dubuque, the Secretary of War through the Chief of Engineers forwarded a report on the proposed work, with a survey. The survey appears to have been made in May, 1879, under the direction of Major F. N. Farquhar. These papers which I hold in my hand are a certified copy.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Iowa aware of the existence of any general law conferring upon the Secretary of War authority to have surveys made?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I am not.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have heard no gentleman state that there has been passed a special law authorizing the survey or beginning of this work.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. SPRINGER. Nor have I heard from any member of the committee or any member of the House any statement of a general law authorizing this particular work. Hence I made the point of order, and I ask the Chair to rule upon it.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I wish to be heard upon that point of order.

Mr. ROBESON. And I.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to recognize gentlemen in their order.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. In addition to what I have already stated upon the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] it has occurred to me that this bill cannot be considered as a general appropriation bill; and that seems to me to be the entire proposition involved in this point of order.

A general appropriation bill, if that term be the subject of definition, is such a bill as makes appropriations for expenses to be incurred or which have been incurred under the general laws of the United States. They must be connected with the general operations of the Government; they must be connected with a general design for the management of the Government. Perhaps that does not give a very complete definition, but it is sufficient to show the definition I now propose to make as applicable to this bill.

There is no general law, there is no general scheme for the improvement of rivers and harbors. There is in fact no general purpose expressed in any law for internal improvements. There is not in the Constitution any expression of purpose that the Government should make any general law for internal improvements. If Congress should undertake to make internal improvements, or improvements of rivers and harbors under general statute, it would first be necessary to adopt a design and purpose in regard to those improvements.

And then there should be a general statute applicable to the subject, so covering it that Congress could act upon it within certain defined and specified limits. Now there has been no such general design adopted; no such general law passed. From the very beginning this particular class of appropriations reported from the Committee on Commerce has not been classed with the ordinary and general appropriations which Congress annually makes. They have been referred to the Committee on Commerce, and that committee has acted upon them as if it had no guide, no law, no discretion but what has been properly defined as the law of log-rolling as well as log-floating. They seem to be controlled by a certain method of compensation between themselves as to the distribution of these improvements among the different parts of the country, not by any general plan or regulation, not by any scheme which the Government has devised or organized, not by any general statute which has ever been discussed or framed; not even by any general scheme or plan which engineers, differing and dividing among themselves, may have proposed as a proper plan upon which the Government should proceed in this matter.

Each individual proposition stands upon its special merits, or rather upon the merits of some one of the excellent Representatives who surround me. And I could wish that I had in myself some special excellence so that I might commend myself in reference to this class of appropriations so as to be beneficently and generously treated by the Committee on Commerce.

This class of appropriations is absolutely special. It is not controlled by any general law; it is absolutely as free as the air. The spirit which seems to control this committee in preparing these bills is not the spirit of law, but the spirit of compensation between themselves, special, complete in itself, and ungoverned by any law.

I have compared it to the wind, but the wind is governed by law; there is a law which regulates the winds, and there is a law which regulates these water-courses. But the Committee on Commerce, when they are considering these bills, has no law, no regulation, no rule. This is not a general appropriation bill, but special in the very worst sense of that term.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire——

The CHAIRMAN. With the permission of the committee the Chair will alternate between gentlemen opposing and supporting the point of order.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to speak against the point of order.

Mr. WARNER. I desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] desire to address the Chair in support of the point of order?

Mr. WARNER. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first hear the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] after which he will recognize the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.]

Mr. WARNER. I desire to address the attention of the Chair to clause 3 of Rule XXI, which is as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

The very language of the rule itself includes this very bill, and undoubtedly was intended to refer to this very bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] look to clause 6 of Rule XXI, and to another clause further along, where he will find that general appropriation bills are spoken of as separate and distinct from this appropriation bill?

Mr. WARNER. I understand that.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire now to speak against the point of order. We have two classes of appropriation bills; one a general class and one a special class. Under our rules these words "general" and "special" are to be construed according to the technical application which is given them in the code which we have adopted for our government.

Now, in that code the word "general" does not mean merely including many subjects, nor does it mean merely the appropriation of large amounts of money. It means that class of appropriations upon which the general movements of the Government depend; that class of appropriations which are necessary for the carrying out of the powers which are given to the several departments of Government. Paragraph 3 of Rule XI fully recognizes and enforces this distinction.

With regard to that class of appropriations it is provided that no special legislation, except of a particular kind, shall be placed upon such general appropriation bills. The philosophy of that rule is that it shall not be in order to force through Congress a special provision of law by placing it upon an appropriation bill which is necessary to the movement and action of the General Government. That is the philosophy of that provision; that is why it is put there; that is why it does not apply to special appropriations; and that is why in the body of these rules, as you will find, appropriations for rivers and harbors are always spoken of as distinct from the question of general legislation. Now I am not arguing as to the meaning of the word "general," and the word "special," in their ordinary signification; I am only discussing the question as to their meaning in this body of rules which is made up for our government. By the provision of this rule all general appropriation bills are to be reported by the Committee on Appropriations, and for that purpose they may report at any time. But the river and harbor appropriation bill may not be reported at any time.

A MEMBER. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. ROBESON. I mean, not under that clause. And the fact that the right is given in another clause enforces my position. I direct the attention of the Chair to the forty-seventh clause of Rule XI:

> The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, namely: The Committee on Elections, on the right of a member to his seat; the Committee on Ways and Means, on bills raising revenue; the Committee on Appropriations, the general appropriation bills.

Does that include the river and harbor bill? Have we not here a construction, directly made in this code of rules, which excludes the river and harbor bill from that collocation of general bills?

Mr. MARSH. Would the gentleman from New Jersey call the bill making appropriations for the Agricultural Department a general appropriation bill?

Mr. ROBESON. I am not discussing that question. I am saying that the river and harbor bill is distinguished in these rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The appropriations for the Agricultural Department were never included in a separate bill until the present rules were adopted.

Mr. ROBESON. I call the attention of the Chair also to clause 6 of Rule XXI, the very rule embracing the provision now in question:

> Upon all general appropriation and revenue bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors—

Are river and harbor bills general appropriation bills? Are they not differently named and differently referred to in this code of rules?

> Upon all general appropriation and revenue bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the yeas and nays shall be taken on the passage of such bills in the House and entered upon the Journal.

Now, suppose the words "bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors" had been left out in this clause, would the yeas and nays be required on the passage of such bills? Certainly they would not. Certainly this House so determined by putting in that special clause; for if the bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors is a general appropriation bill, this class of bills would not have required special mention.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman also turn to the fourth clause of Rule XXIII?

Mr. ROBESON. In one moment. On page 170 of the Digest, in the seventh clause of Rule XI, authorizing the reference of business to committees, I find the following:

> To commerce, life-saving service, and light-houses, other than appropriations for life-saving service and light-houses, to the Committee on Commerce, and the Committee on Commerce shall have the same privileges in reporting bills making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors as is accorded to the Committee on Appropriations in reporting general appropriation bills.

If river and harbor bills are general appropriation bills, why should a special clause be required giving them the same privilege as general appropriation bills?

Mr. McLANE. Now read the order of business.

Mr. ROBESON. I think I have referred to all that is necessary upon this subject; I must leave something to somebody else. It seems to me that under the reading of our rules this question is conclusively settled. Suppose the river and harbor bill is to be regarded as a general appropriation bill, and suppose the clause standing in Rule XXI applies to such a bill, how would you make any appropriation for a river or harbor unless there were some act authorizing specially the appropriation for each particular work?

In discussing this point of order I do not make a speech in favor of this bill; but it is more important that we should have these rules properly understood and properly construed than that any particular bill should pass or be defeated.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Chairman, it is with great diffidence that I rise to address myself to the consideration of this question of order when I consider the skill and experience in parliamentary law, and the knowledge of this particular rule, possessed by the chairman of this Committee of the Whole. I would be quite willing to argue this point at the slightest possible length, did I not fear the consequences of a decision adverse to the view I entertain.

It seems to me impossible to gather true information as to the question whether or not this is a general appropriation bill without referring briefly to our past history in connection with this rule. The whole question was elaborately discussed hardly more than a year ago—discussed by the ablest minds in this body. That discussion I do not go over, for it is fresh in the recollection of us all. At that time the Committee on Rules, headed by the Speaker of the House and embracing as its other members Mr. Garfield, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] and the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] made to this House a unanimous report upon the revision of the rules, in which they used this language:

> The Committee on Rules are of opinion, in consideration of the fact that the Committee on Appropriations are required under the rules to report the general appropriation bills, in which class the river and harbor appropriation bills should by reason of long custom and practice be included.

This was the deliberate judgment of men chosen by reason of their experience, knowledge, and skill on questions of order—a judgment not dissented from by any gentleman on either side of the House in that long and interesting debate. The gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] interested in the fate of that rule, elaborately discussed it; so did his colleague on the Committee on Commerce, the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE;] so did nearly every one interested in questions of order. And it never was denied in that whole debate that the river and harbor bill is a general appropriation bill. There was, so far as my recollection goes—and I searched the debate with great care and attention from beginning to end—no place in which that view of this question was either denied or doubted.

Why should it be doubted? From the foundation almost of the Government itself, except in 1816, and my friend from Texas will correct me if I am wrong, and from that date down bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors were reported either from the Committee on Ways and Means, when that committee embraced also the duties of the Appropriations Committee, and afterward, within twenty years when the Committee on Ways and Means was divided, those bills were reported from the Committee on Appropriations. Subsequent to that time, under the administration of the Appropriations Committee by Mr. Garfield, he as chairman of that committee, on account of pressure of business, as he has already told you, during the four years he was there, it was his habit and the habit of the committee under him to give the consideration of this river and harbor appropriation bill to the Committee on Commerce, and after it was prepared, then to have it reviewed by the Committee on Appropriations, after which for convenience it was sent back to the Committee on Commerce to be reported to the House.

So this has ever been considered and so treated and it will be a new thing, Mr. Chairman, for me to be told and this House to be told that this is a special bill. I say to you in my view that, Mr. Chairman, this committee never does act save under some general law. In this I differ from my friend who raises this point of order. I hold this to be the general law on the subject, that the committee can report no appropriation which is not provided for by law. And what is the general law on this subject? It is that contained in the river and harbor bill of every year authorizing—what? Authorizing the survey of these rivers and harbors—authorizing the Secretary of War to report thereupon to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman allow the Chair to ask him a question for information?

Mr. CLYMER. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. If his position that this is a general appropriation bill within the meaning of the rule be correct, how can the committee put into this bill appropriations for surveys of rivers and harbors?

Mr. CLYMER. That has only been done by consent, and every one of them can be thrown out on the point of order. That point of order, however, has never been made.

Mr. McLANE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question at this point?

Mr. CLYMER. With all respect to the gentleman, I would prefer to conclude what I have to say on this subject.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the general law on the subject. Whenever a survey has been authorized, whenever the Secretary of War, in pursuance of law, has had it made, and after the survey has been made, has submitted his report thereon to Congress as to the advisability of the work, as to its cost, as to the amount of tonnage in case of a harbor—after he has reported all these facts, then the river and harbor bill is the general law, and no opposition can be made to it.

Now, what will be the consequence to this bill and all future bills if this decision be arrived at? I say to you, until the heats of summer come this bill will remain in this committee if this be not the law. Any man, so long as he chooses, can offer an amendment to improve every stream in this land, and if such amendments are permitted to come in, you will never be able to get rid of them. You are too good a parliamentarian, Mr. Chairman, ever to say that so long as I choose to stand here and offer some amendment, some proposition to improve some stream, you cannot rule them out of order. You will be going into the House continuously and forevermore to determine debate on the amendments. I say to the friends of this bill, I say especially to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. REAGAN,] having it in charge, if he denies he is chairman of a general appropriation committee, and it is acting under nothing else than under a law—a law which defines its duty, a law which defines its rights, a law upon which the point of order can be made to keep out amendments, then his bill is dead and all other river and harbor bills are dead. This is the conclusion you must come to, and I pray you, sir, in obedience to the past practice, and in obedience to the common duty of every man who has discussed this question on this floor, that for no present purpose do you reverse what has been the common judgment of this House in the past and what I believe should be in the present and in the future. I now yield the floor.

Mr. ROBESON. Before the gentleman sits down I wish to ask him a question.

Mr. CLYMER. Certainly.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. He has quoted the report of the Committee on Rules. I want to ask him whether on this very point this House in making the rules did not overrule that report and take this bill out of the hands of that committee which that report would on that account have authorized it to control? Did not this House overrule the report of the Committee on Rules and say that this should not be left in the hands of that committee to whom general appropriation bills were given, and should be given especially to this committee? And are we to be governed by that report which was presented for our consideration, or are we to be governed by the code which we adopted and established as the law overriding the report?

Mr. CLYMER. I only say, sir, that by reason of their taking it from the Appropriations Committee and giving it to the Committee on Commerce they could not change its character by that mere reference.

Mr. SPARKS. That is exactly the point. It did not change the character of the bill. It simply changed the mode of framing it for action of the House.

Mr. ROBESON. And my point is that in every single fact connected with that change it shows all through the rule that they stamped a special character upon it.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the point of order will be decided without delay.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, this question is not one that should excite any feeling. It is a question that addresses itself to the sound judgment and discretion of the committee as well as to the chairman of the committee, who is bound to decide upon it. It is insisted that this bill comes under the influence of the third paragraph of Rule XXI, which provides:

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

It is insisted now that this is a general appropriation bill and comes within the provision of this clause of the rule.

In the first place I remark, Mr. Chairman, that from the passage of the first river and harbor bill in 1816, down to to-day, this subject has been treated—for the improvement of rivers and harbors—as a different subject from the appropriations of money made for the ordinary support of the Government, and a subject which stood out by itself, and it stands out in the laws, in the history of this country, in the position of political parties, and in every view we can take of it, it stands out separate and distinct from ordinary appropriation bills for the support of the Government. And as was maintained by the gentleman from New Jersey in the formation of these very rules when it was desired to put it under the control of the Appropriations Committee of this House, it preserved its distinctive character as a river and harbor bill in the interest of the promotion of the commerce of the country, and yet did separate it from that committee which is charged with the appropriation or submission of bills for the ordinary expenses of the Government. Now, by the latter part of clause 7, Rule XI, we find——

Mr. LOUNSBERY. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. REAGAN. Not now, sir. My friend in support of this measure got in a very good speech against the river and harbor bill, and I hope he is satisfied.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I only desired to submit a suggestion that the committee rise and that the House adjourn in order to give the chairman of the committee an opportunity to carefully consider this subject.

Mr. KENNA. The gentleman from Texas has not asked it.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to express my acknowledgment to the gentleman from New York for his profound and elegant wit.

This clause of Rule XI to which I refer provides, in enumerating the powers and duties of committees, that all proposed legislation in reference "to commerce, life-saving service, and light-houses other than appropriations for life-saving service and light-houses, shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce." And it also provides that the Committee on Commerce shall have the same privileges in reporting bills making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors as is accorded to the Committee on Appropriations in reporting general appropriation bills.

By clause 3 of this same rule it is provided that proposed legislation referring to the appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government shall be committed to the Committee on Appropriations; and, as I have shown, that matters relating to commerce, life-saving service, &c., shall go to the Committee on Commerce, showing that this committee has the same duties in reference to reporting bills making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors as is given to the Committee on Appropriations in reporting general appropriation bills. Here, sir, I submit that the rules of the House, the very law of our action, now make a clear, specific discrimination between appropriation bills and river and harbor bills.

Then paragraph 6 of Rule XXI is as follows:

> Upon all general appropriation and revenue bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the yeas and nays shall be taken on the passage of such bills in the House and entered upon the Journal.

There again under another rule the distinction is clearly taken between general appropriation and river and harbor bills; and again by clause 4 of Rule XXIII it is provided that—

> In Committee of the Whole House, business on their Calendars shall be taken up in regular order except bills for raising revenue—

That is the Committee on Ways and Means—> general appropriation bills—

That is the Committee on Appropriations—> and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors—

Which bills are reported by the Committee on Commerce—> which shall have precedence, and when objection is made to the consideration of any bill or proposition the committee shall thereupon rise, &c.

Now, Mr. Chairman, bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors come, as I have already stated, from the Committee on Commerce. Bills for raising revenue under the rule must come from the Committee on Ways and Means, and bills appropriating revenue for the ordinary expenses of the Government must come from the Committee on Appropriations. These bills for improving rivers and harbors must therefore come from the Committee on Commerce, that committee alone having the power to originate them.

I have shown that through all these rules there is a class distinction between these bills. Now, it is said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this was a general appropriation bill. I call the attention of that gentleman to the fact that the experience of the Government has shown that every Congress from 1789 to now has been called upon to make general appropriations for the support of the Government, and then, looking at that, I turn to the history of the appropriations for rivers and harbors, and find that the first appropriation of this character was made on the 27th of April, 1816. Now, Mr. Chairman, if it had been the judgment of our fathers that this was a general appropriation bill is it reasonable to suppose that the Government would have proceeded in the discharge of its functions, each Congress having proceeded to the discharge of its legislative duties from 1789 up to 1816, before it passed a single appropriation bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors?

The next in the order of time was seven years after that. On the 3d of March, 1823, the second river and harbor bill was passed. The first was approved by President Madison, the second was approved by President Monroe. The third bill was passed on the 26th of May, 1824, and was also approved by Mr. Monroe. Two years later, the 20th of May, 1826, a river and harbor bill was passed, and was approved by Mr. John Quincy Adams. Then for the other three years of his administration each year a river and harbor bill was passed and approved by him.

For the eight years that General Jackson was President of the United States, each year a river and harbor bill was passed and each year a river and harbor bill was approved by that old hero and faithful democrat that my good friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] not now in his seat, would read out of the democratic party for sanctioning a river and harbor bill. He approved one for each of the eight years he served as President.

In 1838 a river and harbor bill was approved by Mr. Van Buren. So that Madison, Monroe, Jackson, and Van Buren would all have to be read out of the democratic party by my friend from New York, whom I now see in his seat. Mr. Tyler——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Texas that he would be glad if he would confine himself strictly to the question of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I will do so. Perhaps I was going further than was necessary. My purpose was to meet the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I was not voluntarily going out of the discussion on the point of order but was meeting what he said was the historic illustration of the fact that this was a general appropriation bill. I appeal to history to show that in the whole history of the Government it never was treated as a general appropriation bill. And I have referred specifically to the rules of this House, and to the action of this House in the late revision of these rules, to show that the river and harbor bill preserved to itself an individuality by which it was separated from the general appropriation bills, and that it occupies that position before us to-day. It cannot be held to be a general appropriation bill.

Mr. BLAND. I ask the gentleman from Texas to have this rule read——

Mr. CALKINS rose.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I rise to make a privileged motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I move that the committee rise; and I do so for the reason stated by the gentleman from New Jersey, that the decision of this question is of greater importance than any action we can take upon this bill.

Mr. CALKINS. Was I recognized by the Chair?

Mr. BLAND. Before the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] had finished his remarks I asked him to have a rule read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] when the gentleman from New York [Mr. LOUNSBERY] said he rose to a privileged motion. The Chair permitted the gentleman from New York to state what was his privileged motion, but the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Indiana to address the committee.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I understand the motion to rise takes priority.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York cannot take a gentleman off the floor in order to make that motion. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] had the floor by recognition of the Chair.

Mr. CALKINS. I take it the Chair is precluded from giving any other construction as to what general appropriation bills are than that given by the action of the House. The rule relied upon by gentlemen claiming that this is a general appropriation bill states that—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, &c.

And this discussion has arisen as to what a general appropriation bill is. Now, the House has decided that itself in adopting these rules; and if gentlemen will turn to page 169 of the Manual, Rule XI, clause 3, they will find that this House has put a construction upon this itself:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, to wit: The subjects relating—

3. To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government—to the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, all appropriation bills which contain appropriations of public money for the support of the Government, according to the construction placed upon these rules by the House itself in enacting them, are general appropriation bills.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Can any bill be more general than this?

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman permit me one question?

Mr. CALKINS. In a moment. All bills which contain appropriations of public money not for the support of the Government are not general appropriation bills, and the House has so said.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman now permit me to ask the question?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MARSH. What will the gentleman say in regard to the appropriations for the Agricultural Department?

Mr. CALKINS. The Agricultural Department is now by law just as much a part of the Government as the Judicial Department or the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MARSH. And yet the appropriations for that Department are not consigned to the care of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. CALKINS. I am not arguing it upon the basis the gentleman assumes, that because this bill has been taken away and separated from the Appropriations Committee therefore it is not a general appropriation bill. I say if it was in the hands of the Appropriations Committee it would still not be a regular appropriation bill. Take the first item in this bill. It is an appropriation for a specific harbor. Suppose the bill stops there; is it a regular appropriation bill? Take the bill now on the Calendar for the erection of public buildings. There are in that bill thirty or forty buildings. Because it contains thirty or forty buildings, is it a regular appropriation bill? Though it may contain many appropriations for a number of buildings, still it is special in every item. So is this. You cannot confuse a special bill with a general bill because it makes many appropriations in one bill.

Mr. MARSH. Is not an appropriation for the construction of the State Department building in this city for the purpose of carrying on the Government?

Mr. CALKINS. In one sense it may be; in another it is not.

Mr. MARSH. And so with the construction of custom-house and post-office buildings everywhere throughout the country.

Mr. CALKINS. In one sense, true; in another, not. Whatever is necessary to carry on this Government, whatever this House says is necessary to carry on the General Government and keep its various branches from dying by inanition for want of appropriations, is a general appropriation bill.

Mr. MARSH. Is not appropriating money to provide a secure harbor for naval vessels an appropriation for the purpose of carrying on the General Government?

Mr. CALKINS. No, it is not. I therefore say to this House and to the Chair, that the Chair is concluded by the construction which this House has itself given to these rules. When it said that no general appropriation bill should be loaded down by certain provisions, it means bills making those appropriations which are necessary for the support of the General Government.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I want to say a word on the point of order.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to have a rule read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say that he is very reluctant to limit debate on a question of order where the argument is addressed to the Chair himself; yet he hopes that gentlemen will not unnecessarily consume time.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to inquire of the Chair if he is satisfied on this subject?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has once or twice said that he is ready to rule upon the question, but he will not say that he is entirely satisfied, for such a statement would not be strictly accurate.

Mr. BLAND. I ask to have clause 5 of Rule XXI read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the clause.

The Clerk read as follows:

All bills for improvement of rivers and harbors and for the establishment or change of post-routes shall be delivered to the Clerk, as in the case of petitions and memorials, for reference to appropriate committees.

Mr. BLAND. That clause of the rule shows simply that bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors are put in the petition-box the same as bills for the establishment of post-routes. They are reported back to the House in an omnibus bill, and acted upon in that way; but that does not make the river and harbor appropriation bill a general appropriation bill.

Many MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. SPARKS. If this committee would consider for a moment that this question is one of vital importance, we perhaps could get through with it in an orderly manner. If it is ruled that this particular appropriation bill is not of the class mentioned in clause 3 of Rule XXI, then no objection can be made to anything offered by way of amendment to it. Hence this point is one of vital importance and the time we have consumed in this discussion has been well spent.

Rule XXI, clause 3, says "no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill," &c. Now, what is a general appropriation bill? Does not this bill, called the river and harbor appropriation bill, come within that term? Is it not a general appropriation bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors? Everybody must at once say that it is such a bill.

The technical point is made that this bill is not of the class of appropriation bills reported from the Committee on Appropriations and in the sense of the rule just quoted not general appropriations.

It seems to me that looking at these river and harbor appropriation bills outside of the rules, they are certainly general in their character. The clause of the rule to which I have referred relates to general appropriation bills. Now is this bill without rule? Is there no check upon such a bill as this? Is it a special bill without rule? Why, of course not. Everybody knows that it is general in its character.

Up to within the last four or five years this was an appropriation bill belonging to the Committee on Appropriations. Up to the adoption of the last rules this bill belonged to the Committee on Appropriations. Up to the hour that these new rules were adopted it belonged to that committee. Am I right in that?

Mr. ATKINS. In theory, yes.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, says that he so understands it. Some years back, by the tacit consent of the Appropriations Committee, this bill was given in charge of the Committee on Commerce. During the time that it was reported by the Committee on Appropriations, or if now reported by that committee, no man would deny that it was a general appropriation bill. But being given to another committee we have got into the habit of regarding it as not belonging to this general class of appropriations. It is, however, general in its character, and without we continue the ruling which has always been held, that this river and harbor appropriation bill is one of general character, where will we be? In my opinion we will be at sea without compass and without guide.

Mr. HOUSE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOUSE. Is the Chair prepared to decide this question?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so announced once or twice.

Mr. HOUSE. Then let us have the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not desire to take up any time in discussing this matter; I only ask that a decision made in the Forty-second Congress——

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] to give way for a motion that the committee now rise.

Many MEMBERS. Vote! Vote! Decision! Decision!

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not propose to make any remarks at all. I say that to relieve this committee of any apprehension of that kind. I only want to say that there was a decision made in the Forty-second Congress by Mr. Speaker BLAINE.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman read it?

Mr. ROBINSON. When the river and harbor appropriation bill was brought into the House for consideration Mr. Farnsworth made this inquiry:

I wish to inquire whether this bill is an annual appropriation bill recognized as such by law or by the rules of this House.

The SPEAKER. It is not. It is in accordance with a usage of many years' standing that a motion to make it a special order in Committee of the Whole has always been entertained; but no further than that has it been treated as a regular appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That was a question as to whether or not the river and harbor bill was an annual appropriation bill provided for by law.

A MEMBER. That is it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I give the decision for what it may be worth.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide this question. At first he was very much disposed to entertain the opinion that this bill was to be included among the general appropriation bills, and treated as such under the rules of the House; but subsequent investigation of the subject has satisfied the Chair that such a decision would not have been correct. Of course, if it were not for the express provision of the rules there would be no difference between a general appropriation bill and any other bill brought into the House, so far as parliamentary law would be applicable; in other words, all bills would be governed by precisely the same rules and the same principles under general parliamentary law. Therefore this question depends entirely upon the provisions of the rules.

Now, it is true that the Committee on Rules, in making its report to the House at the last session of Congress, said in one part of the report that the bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors had become by long usage one of the general appropriation bills. But in another part of that report the committee used this language:

The river and harbor appropriation bill, although not one of the general appropriation bills, (see Rule 77)—

The Chair will in a moment refer to Rule 77—

has for many years past been one of the regular annual appropriation bills and has been reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Then follows a concise history of the river and harbor bills in the past.

The House determined that this river and harbor bill should not be reported by the Committee on Appropriations, as the Committee on Rules had recommended in its first report, but should be reported by the Committee on Commerce. Of course that fact alone would not prevent it from being a general appropriation bill if it were in substance such. But the whole matter depending, as the Chair has said, upon the rules, the Chair looks at the rules and finds that there is a distinction recognized all the way through between the general appropriation bills and the river and harbor bill. That distinction is recognized twice in Rule XI; it is recognized distinctly in the sixth clause of Rule XXI; and again distinctly in the fourth clause of Rule XXIII, where these various bills are spoken of. The Chair is therefore compelled to hold that the river and harbor bill is not under the new revision of the rules, as it was not under the old Rule No. 77, a general appropriation bill. The Clerk will read Rule 77 of the old code of rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall also be the duty of the Committee on Appropriations, within thirty days after their appointment, at every session of Congress, commencing on the first Monday of December, to report the general appropriation bills for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for consular and diplomatic expenses; for the Army; for the Navy; for the expenses of the Indian Department; for the payment of invalid and other pensions; for the support of the Military Academy; for fortifications; for the service of the Post-Office Department, and for mail transportation by ocean steamers; or, in failure thereof, the reasons of such failure.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be observed that there is a specific enumeration in the rule itself of all the general appropriation bills, and that the bill appropriating money for public works upon rivers and harbors is not included. Now, whatever may be the consequences of this ruling, the Chair, of course, is not responsible for them. He feels that in making this decision he is governed by the express provisions of the rules themselves, which he cannot fail to observe.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I want to say a few words now in behalf of my amendment.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I think my motion that the committee rise is in order now under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. LOUNSBERY] took the floor a few moments ago to make this motion, the Chair will now put it.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope it will be the pleasure of the Committee of the Whole to proceed with this bill. Let us try to dispose of it.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I am holding the floor, I presume, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York rose a few moments ago to make the motion that the committee rise, which the Chair did not entertain at that time.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] had the floor when the point of order was raised; and if he gives way for a motion that the committee rise, I submit that he will have the floor when the question comes up again.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield for the motion?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I do, provided I do not lose my right to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman immediately after this motion is disposed of.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 85.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. For the purpose of getting an exact expression of the committee, I demand tellers.

Mr. ATKINS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Texas whether he does not think it best to provide for a session this evening to finish this bill. There are but eleven or twelve days remaining before the expiration of this Congress. Two of the most important general appropriation bills have not yet been reported—the sundry civil bill and the deficiency bill. The sundry civil bill carries over twenty million dollars and requires four or five days to get it through. There is actually but one appropriation bill which so far has gone upon the statute-book. In my judgment it is necessary we should resort to some means to get clear of this bill, either to pass it or to kill it. [Cries of "Let us have a night session!"] For one I am for the bill, and I hope the gentleman from Texas will ask gentlemen to-night to come back here and dispose of it one way or the other.

Mr. PRICE. They will not do it; you will have no quorum, and the whole night will be spent filibustering and getting a quorum.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. It will not do for the gentleman from Texas or any other person to undertake to force a session of the House beyond a reasonable and proper number of hours.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I rise to the point that no quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are not ordered, fifteen only having voted in the affirmative. The noes have it, and the committee refuses to rise.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I made the point of order that there was no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will then appoint tellers, and he again appeals to the committee to vote on one side or the other.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman's point of order that there was no quorum came too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints Mr. VAN VOORHIS and Mr. KENNA as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 115.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I want to say a few words in favor of my amendment. The Mississippi River, as everybody knows, disdains push-boat and pole navigation and modified mill-dams. [Laughter.] It is a stream that has commerce upon it. It is a stream of interstate importance much larger than Cheese Creek. [Laughter.]

Above the city of Quincy, Illinois, there is not an ice-harbor. An ice-harbor is needed by the shipping interests of that section of the river, extending about seven hundred miles. The Engineer Department declares the necessity and importance of this improvement. In the report which I hold in my hand occurs the following:

There is no doubt that a good ice-harbor is needed in this section of the Upper Mississippi River.

Further on the report says:

Having so few harbors the most of the steamers are hauled out every winter, either on private ways, kept up at considerable expense, or at the several ship-yards along the river, which, however, can accommodate only a portion of the boats. Thus this manner of laying a boat up for the winter entails a heavy annual tax on the owner, the cost of laying up a steamer ranging from $100 to $500 according to the tonnage, besides the calking, which is necessary before the boat can be launched again at the opening of navigation.

The report goes on in some length and declares that this point possesses the essential qualities of an ice-harbor. It is asked for by the whole shipping interests of the great Mississippi River. I am serving the purpose of no purely local interest. I speak in favor of interstate trade. I speak in favor of a stream which affords facilities for competition with railroad transportation, and I hope the House will adopt the amendment and thereby add to its many good features another good feature.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa.

The committee divided; and there were ayes 18, noes not counted.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Erie, Pennsylvania, $20,000.

Mr. OSMER. I move to strike out "20" and insert "30," so it will read "$30,000." I desire to call the attention of the committee to the harbor at Erie, it being the only outlet Pennsylvania has on that great lake.

The Engineer Department estimated and recommended for the improvement and security of this harbor the sum of $50,000. Twenty-five thousand dollars was appropriated last year, but for some reason or other the appropriation for this year has been cut down to $20,000. I say to the gentlemen of the committee there is no more important harbor on the inland waters of this continent than that at Erie, Pennsylvania. You all know its history. There it was that Perry's fleet was built and from which it sailed. It is a natural harbor, surrounded, with the exception of an inlet, by Presque Isle. The western portion of that island is subject to storms, and unless sufficient appropriation be made to protect this harbor and make available other appropriations heretofore granted from year to year, what has already been expended will be, as it were, lost.

I desire to say one word further in respect to this improvement. I do not underestimate at all the great water-way known as the Mississippi River; but I say to this committee that from the great Northwest, from the great lakes reaching beyond Chicago down across Lake Erie, floats every year commerce that in amount and importance rivals the commerce of the Mississippi River, passing as it does through that lake down into the Welland Canal to make connection with the Gulf of Saint Lawrence and the ports of Europe.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, the committee will look favorably on that harbor in the State of Pennsylvania on the shores of Lake Erie. The appropriation is only $30,000, and every dollar will be needed, as the Engineer's Department have recommended, to protect this harbor from destruction.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLYMER. I move to add after line 186 the following:

For the improvement of the Kiskiminetas and Conemaugh rivers in Pennsylvania, according to the report and estimates of the engineers made in pursuance of an act of Congress, $40,000,000.

[Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. I will vote for that.

Mr. CLYMER. I only desire to say——[cries of "Vote!"] I am entitled to be heard. I have asked nothing in this bill, and do not ask much now. [Laughter.] I should have done it last year, but this bill was passed under a suspension of the rules, and I did not have the opportunity. Besides, the reports which you should have had here last year did not reach us until this year. If we had had these reports last year I have no doubt the committee without hesitation would have agreed to pass this amendment. [Laughter.] This is not a large sum of money. It is a very moderate sum. I only give the exact amount stated by the engineers. They estimate that it would take $40,000,000. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Do the engineers recommend that amount?

Mr. CLYMER. They say it will take that much to do it. [Loud cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] My colleague has neglected this subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. One word, if the gentleman will allow. My colleague has misrepresented the facts. He does not know where the Kiskiminetas is. My colleague does not know anything about the geography of his own State, and if he visits that region of country now they will drown him. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLYMER. Not in the Kiskiminetas; there is not material enough in there to do that. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. They will drown him there so deep, politically, that he will never be heard of again. Now one word seriously. [Laughter and cries of "Oh, no!"] I will not be misrepresented or allow my people to be misrepresented. The gentleman, who is my colleague, and who ought to be proud of his State, who ought to be proud of her material resources——

Mr. CLYMER. And proud of all her Representatives.

Mr. WHITE. Has deliberately gotten up here before the country and sought to bring ridicule, laughter, and reproach upon a portion of the great State that he represents. If that gratifies his heart and ambition, if it does him any good, and he regards it as a serviceable thing to do for his State, it does me no injury, and he is welcome to all the glory. The gentleman misstates the fact. As a matter of fact, the engineers who made the survey did not report that it would take $40,000,000 to improve the Kiskiminetas and Conemaugh Rivers. My friend and colleague knows but little of the history of the Engineer's report if he thinks that this amount was proposed to improve the navigation of those two rivers alone, and he evidently knows less about the geography of his own State. The gentleman does not know, perhaps, what he ought to know, that some few years ago the President of the United States called the attention of Congress to the propriety of inaugurating measures for the creation of water-routes to the seaboard; and in pursuance of this recommendation a committee was appointed in the United States Senate on seaboard routes and survey made of a variety of routes under the authority of this committee. All of these routes avoided the great State of Pennsylvania. At that time it was found that there was no voice heard here for the interest of that great State and for the purpose of establishing the feasibility or practicability of a water-route by way of the Allegheny, Kiskiminetas, and Conemaugh and connecting with the Juniata and Susquehanna, and thence to the seaboard. This survey was made and the estimate of the cost of this route was made which the gentleman has quoted, and was about forty million dollars. This, sir, was the cost of the entire water-way from the headwaters of the Ohio at Pittsburgh up the Allegheny to the Kiskiminetas, to the Conemaugh, and thence by way of the Juniata and Susquehanna to the sea. This route was surveyed and recommended by way of contrast to the seaboard route by the Kanawha, New Creek, and James Rivers down to the seaboard. This and other surveys were made, and the report made in order to demonstrate the fact that a water-route could be established through the State of Pennsylvania as well as the rival one to which I have referred. My colleague, therefore, in offering the amendment which he does in ridicule, has evidently not familiarized himself with the actual facts, and it is proper that I should go upon the record in this way in justice to my State and her people.

I repeat, then, that before my colleague seeks to bring ridicule upon the material interests of his State he should familiarize himself with the capabilities of our streams to be utilized for grand water-ways from the West to the East. No one here is asking for $40,000,000 for the improvement of the Kiskiminetas. All that is asked now in this bill is an additional appropriation for the Allegheny, so that practical and necessary work may be continued with the view of utilizing the lower waters of that important river. The time will no doubt come when the waters of the Kiskiminetas, Conemaugh, and Susquehanna will be utilized for a grand water-way through Pennsylvania, notwithstanding the ridicule and contempt which my honorable colleague is trying to throw upon the material interests of his State. I repeat, then, for the benefit of my colleague, that the intelligent population of the Kiskiminetas Valley will give proper appreciation to him for the ridicule he seeks to throw upon them, should opportunity ever present.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLYMER. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Annapolis, Maryland, $5,000.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

Strike out, in lines 93 and 94, the words "improving harbor at Annapolis, Maryland, $5,000."

There is one respectable appropriation for the State of Maryland, and that is for the harbor at Baltimore. There are six or seven of these little amounts that ought never to be thought of for a moment, and I am credibly informed that the member of the Committee on Commerce from the State of Maryland voted against every one of these little appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors in that State, except Baltimore, and the committee forced these things upon the State of Maryland against the vote and opposition of that distinguished gentleman, a member of that committee from that State. I hope it will be stricken out. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TALBOTT. I desire to say that my colleague in whose district the appropriation is made by this bill is absent from the House. I do not propose, neither does any member of the delegation from Maryland propose, to say anything in regard to the amendment during his absence.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Oswego, New York, including dredging channel to lower harbor, $50,000.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the section just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 102 and 103 and insert in place thereof the following:

"For enlargement and improvement according to plan and recommendation of the Engineer's Department of harbor facilities at Oswego, New York, including dredging entrance to harbor, $50,000."

Mr. MASON. It will be observed that my amendment does not change the appropriation as reported in this bill. The amount is the same. It only changes the phraseology and makes more specific the purposes of it. I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. KENNA. I shall not object to that, and I hope it will be adopted by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Shrewsbury River, New Jersey: Completing improvements, $86,000; of which sum $36,000 shall be expended on South Branch, and $50,000 on Main and North Branch.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the paragraph just read.

This paragraph appropriates the sum of $86,000 for a stream which I am informed is navigable for only ten miles for small steamboats by going up and down with the tide. This is not push-boat navigation, or row-boat navigation, or modified mill-dam navigation; but it is a sort of marine coasting or sliding of a vessel which floats up and down with the tide. That is the information I have with respect to it.

On page 542 of the report of the Engineer is a statement with reference to this improvement; and among the reasons stated why it should be made is given the fact that the amount of revenue collected at Perth Amboy during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, was $21,000. Over four times the amount of revenue collected in that collection district is appropriated in this single paragraph.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is that a little stream in the rear of Long Branch, that pleasure-boats sail in?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I believe this is not the one. However, the report shows that the collection district—I cannot turn to it in the time I have—has appropriations in this bill amounting to $180,000. And in the reports asking for these appropriations this sum of $21,000 is cited in support of the claim for five or six different appropriations amounting in the aggregate to about one hundred and eighty thousand dollars. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] And this is for a stream only ten miles in extent.

Mr. ROSS. This river has a commerce of from one to two million dollars a year. It is navigated by five steamboats, and the people on the line of the river are very anxious that it shall be improved. I will send to the Clerk's desk two letters to have read. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] If gentlemen do not care to hear them I will have them printed with my remarks. They are as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, February 15, 1881.

MY DEAR SIR: My attention has been directed this morning to certain statements in respect to the Shrewsbury River improvements, which seem to have been uttered in the House on Saturday last. I have carefully read these statements in the RECORD, and being, as you know, a resident of the vicinity in question, I have no hesitation in pronouncing them absolutely false.

The money thus far expended in the improvement of the Shrewsbury River has been economically and judiciously used. The improvement is of great benefit to a very large agricultural community.

The work has all been done by contracts awarded to the lowest bidder, and the channel of the river has been deepened and made navigable at low tide for vessels which could not before the improvements were made have navigated the river at high tide. In short, I know of no place in this country where an expenditure of money to the extent asked for can be so profitably applied.

Yours, very truly,

J. R. McPHERSON.

Hon. MILES ROSS.

RED BANK, February 14, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I see by the papers some one has wrote a letter to Mr. COX about the improvements of the Shrewsbury River, stating that no improvement has been made. Now I say this is a false statement, and can prove it by practical men, men which navigate the river, they are the men knows. I have been on the river for forty-five years, and I know something about it. I know that we could not have run our boats last year had not they improved it. Now, I would like to know that gentleman's name, for I think he is a man that knows nothing about it. Now, I can give the best references of my experience, such men as Moses Taylor, Samuel Sloan, John J. Astor, Howard Poter, Thomas Kenny, Clarkson N. Potter, John Hoey, and many others too numerous to mention, from New York, besides all Red Bank.

Yours, truly,

F. A. LITTLE.

Hon. MILES ROSS, Washington, D. C.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. CLYMER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the paragraph last read the following:

"For the improvement of the river front and the navigation thereof in the city of Washington, according to such plans as may be devised and prescribed by the Chief of Engineers, $500,000."

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say but a word. This should commend itself to the judgment of this House. Whether it is willing to vote that amount I do not know; but it does seem to me there is a general opinion here that should prompt every member on this committee to vote some amount so that this Government may enter into some system of improvements with reference to this city which will not only benefit the navigation of this river, but will restore to the city that health which has been so destroyed by malarious influences arising from want of proper care in regard to it. I mean this in earnest. I am willing to vote that sum or a smaller sum, or if necessary a larger sum. The amendment is within the scope of this bill and I hope the committee will adopt it.

Mr. O'NEILL. It is impossible in the prevailing confusion to know what the gentleman says. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WARNER. I submit to the Chair, if we are to proceed with this bill we should do so in an orderly way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has endeavored all the day through, as gentlemen will concede, to secure order on the floor. The Chair suggests to gentlemen that these demands for a vote, instead of facilitating the transaction of business, actually delay it; because gentlemen who desire to speak on the bill have a right to speak and are only obstructed by these calls.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving New River from lead mines in Wythe County, Virginia, to mouth of Greenbrier River, $20,000; of which sum $12,000 shall be expended in the continuation of the work from the mouth of Greenbrier up, and $8,000 in the continuation of the work from the lead mines in Wythe County down.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the paragraph just read. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the character of that stream as a reason why this appropriation is improper. I read from the report of the engineer, page 677. He says:

The estimate for a 2-feet navigation for bateaux was $115,000.

This appropriation is only $12,000.

For a 3-feet steamboat navigation, $1,200,000; for a 5-feet steamboat navigation, $1,600,000. The combined estimates for the completion of the improvement of the three sections of the river for navigation by bateaux and small steamboats amount to $205,000.

Further on he says:

The work is of great benefit to bateaux, enabling them to get through with a great deal of ease and carry much larger cargoes than formerly; and in fact they can run now where it was utterly impossible before, owing to the water.

They could not run at all before.

Of these lines there are three—one to Bluestone, five miles; one to Crockett's Store, four and a half miles, and one to Lick Creek, twenty miles above Hinton.

It is also an advantage to the lumber business, as rafts can go through easily, and many hundred thousand feet have been taken down stream this spring from the origin of the Bluestone.

Now, I wish to be understood as not being opposed to appropriations for the really navigable streams of this country. I will yield to no man in my devotion to the improvement of every navigable stream which is of general importance. But for this character of streams I will never consent that one dollar shall be appropriated when I can prevent it. And I feel justified in opposing it and calling the attention of the country to the character of thundergust streams and mud puddles which are to be improved, not for the purpose of navigation, but in order that certain men may again be returned to this House. Many of them can serve no other purpose.

I must avail myself of my right here to make these objections and to give the best information I have been able to obtain of the character of those streams, although God knows that information is poor enough. We have no information except what we get between the lines of these reports. As a friend of mine said yesterday in respect to these reports, we have no information except what we get through "injudicious friends."

Mr. HENDERSON. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] what he means by these allusions. I do so because of the fact that heretofore he has stated that he was compelled to go to the Senate and hunt up this information there, when I know it has been accessible to every member of this House who used diligence and tried to obtain it by going to the room of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I went to the room of the Committee on Commerce four different times and was denied admission. I went again and succeeded in obtaining admission, but I could not get these reports. I sent for them and they were denied me. I applied to the gentleman from Illinois himself, [Mr. HENDERSON,] and he said I could not get one unless I would go to the committee-room again. And then I sent to the room of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, or got a friend to do so, and there I obtained the report.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want to say in all good nature to my friend from Iowa that if he went to the room of the Committee on Commerce four times and tried to get in there and did not succeed he is the only member of this House, in my opinion, who tried to get in there and was unable to do so.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I make no complaint about the matter, except when the point is raised.

Mr. HENDERSON. One word further in this connection. I myself not only hunted up members who wished to be heard before the Committee on Commerce, but I know that other members of the committee did the same thing.

Mr. HUMPHREY. This bill shows that somebody got in there. [Laughter.]

Many MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. My point of order is that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] and others have no right to yell out "Vote!" "Vote!" within the five minutes to which the gentleman is entitled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Especially when streams of West Virginia are the subject of debate.

The CHAIRMAN. No one is better aware than the gentleman from New York himself [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] of the fact that it is not within the power of any presiding officer to compel members to stop making a noise on the floor if they are determined to do so.

Mr. WILSON. And let me say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] that he has been more offensive and given more annoyance to this House than any other member here. [Laughter.]

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa; and upon a division there were—ayes 24, noes 79.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. VAN VOORHIS said: I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Many MEMBERS. Withdraw that point.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I will do so if it is agreed that the committee shall rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order having been made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. KENNA, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. UPDEGRAFF, who submitted the pending amendment.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I have not made the point of order that a quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from New York, Mr. VAN VOORHIS, in place of the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. UPDEGRAFF.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 18, noes 124.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes that gentlemen will come forward and vote, so as to make a quorum.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the committee now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is now dividing.

The count was continued, and the tellers further reported 2 more in the affirmative.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. No quorum has voted.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I move that the committee now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not entertain that motion until this vote is completed, as but three are needed to make a quorum. The tellers will continue their count.

The tellers continued their count, and reported 5 more in the affirmative.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers report 25 in the affirmative and 124 in the negative, which is a quorum. The noes have it and the amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 44, noes 89.

Mr. MILLS. There is no amendment now pending, and I therefore move that the committee rise and report this bill back to the House and recommend its passage.

Mr. FORT. The bill has not been read through by paragraphs yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that motion is in order under the rules.

Mr. BRAGG. Would it be in order to move that the committee rise and ask of the House that it be discharged from the further consideration of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide that question when the motion is made.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the committee now rise and ask that it be discharged from the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have an amendment to offer at the close of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has not been read through yet.

Mr. CHALMERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHALMERS. It is a question which I started to ask the other day when the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] was on the floor.

The Chair will perhaps remember that in the Forty-fifth Congress when a tariff bill was under discussion in Committee of the Whole the proposition was made to strike out the enacting clause before the bill had been read through.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the present motion.

Mr. CHALMERS. I understand that; but by that motion the opponents of the bill were enabled to bring the discussion to an end. Now, if that was possible, I ask why may it not be possible for the friends of a bill to move to report it to the House for passage before it has been read through?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. It had better be passed before it is read, for it will not stand reading.

Mr. CHALMERS. My point is that if a bill can be defeated without being read it may be passed without being read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] is aware of the fact that when a motion is made and carried in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to strike out the enacting clause of a bill, if the House fails to concur in that action the Committee of the Whole immediately, without any further motion, resume the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CHALMERS. Very good, sir. In this case, if the House refuses to pass the bill, it might in the same way go back into the Committee of the Whole upon it.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say to the friends of the bill who are making these motions that we have carefully considered every one of them in consultation with the officers who control the deliberations of the House and the Committee of the Whole, and that we fail to see how we can accomplish the purpose of the friends of the bill by any such method. While I am up I want to say that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] wishes to submit an amendment to the appropriations for the Mississippi River, which amendment we desire shall be adopted. I do not see, therefore, how we can get along except by going on with the reading of the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I would like the Chair to put the question on my motion. No one made a point of order upon it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I make the point of order that the bill has not been read through.

The CHAIRMAN. Several gentlemen are making points of order and demanding that the bill be read through in Committee of the Whole. The Chair does not see how under the rules he can deprive members of that right.

Mr. BRAGG. I would like to know what rule there is that makes my motion out of order, and under what precedent the Chair decides that it is out of order to move that the Committee of the Whole rise and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman know any rule that allows such a motion to be adopted in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BRAGG. I submit that a motion that the Committee of the Whole rise and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of a bill is a motion recognized by the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware of any rule recognizing such a motion at the present stage in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The Chair has already held that this bill must be read through in order that opportunity may be given for amendment.

Mr. BRAGG. When the Committee of the Whole has considered a bill so far as it may desire to consider it, and the bill is in the judgment of the committee perfect, is it not within the power of the committee to ask to be discharged from its further consideration? If a majority of the committee do not desire further to consider a bill, have they not the right to say so, and can the Chair say that the voice of the majority in that direction cannot prevail under the rules?

The CHAIRMAN. But the House has referred the bill to the Committee of the Whole for the express purpose of having it considered; the order of the House is an order to the committee to consider the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. The committee have considered it; and if the motion I make prevails the committee will decide that they have considered it until they are satisfied with it.

Mr. BARBER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent to pass over such portions of the bill as no gentleman may desire to amend?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. It will require very little time to read any portions of the bill, if the reading is not interrupted by amendments. [Cries of "Read!" "Read!"]

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Improving Savannah Harbor and River, Georgia, $25,000, of which sum $1,000 may be applied to payment of damages for land.

Mr. COOK. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$25,000" and inserting "$65,000."

Mr. Chairman, Savannah is about the third port on the Atlantic in respect to the amount of its exports, and ranks among the first in the whole country. Our annual export of cotton is about seven hundred thousand bales. The Engineer Department has recommended the expenditure of $65,000 for continuing the improvement at Savannah, and if this appropriation were made it would open that harbor to vessels of the heaviest burden. Savannah is now connected by railroad with the far West, and western men are largely interested in the improvement of this harbor, as the nearest Atlantic port for their produce.

Members of the republican party are making great professions of friendship toward our section of country, and proclaiming their great desire to aid us in building up our commerce. This amendment presents a splendid opportunity for them to show their sympathy in a practical manner. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOK'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the whole appropriation. I find here in respect to one of these improvements there is a land-owner who wants to speculate out of it, and I find this from one of their injudicious friends:

It was found on inquiry it would be impossible to get possession of these lands at reasonable cost by purchase in consequence of the high speculative value at which they were held. The owner of Fig Island asked $5,000 for three acres not worth more than $500 at the outside.

And yet here in this bill it is proposed to pay this man $1,000 for it.

Again, in respect to the river, another injudicious friend says:

It was found from examination, which embraced all the Savannah River above Augusta, a length of one hundred and seven miles, to the mouth of the Tugaloo, and forty-six and one-half miles up the latter to the head of pole-boat navigation, a total length of one hundred and fifty-four miles, the obstructions consist chiefly of rocky ledges. The cost of improvement for Pole-Boat Channel, three feet by thirty, from Augusta to Trotter's Shoal, sixty-four miles, $45,000.

It is proposed during the current fiscal year to begin the improvement of that portion of the river, sixty-four miles in length, between Augusta and Trotter's Shoal, with a view of establishing a channel three feet deep and thirty feet wide for pole-boat navigation. That is all I have to say.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether it would not be necessary to add the same provision to this paragraph which was added to that in reference to Oakland Harbor, that this appropriation shall not be available until the right to make the improvement shall be ceded to the United States without charge?

Mr. REAGAN. The United States has the right now.

Mr. PAGE. To the satisfaction of the Secretary of War?

Mr. REAGAN. The United States has the unconditional right. There is no impediment to it.

Mr. PAGE. I thought from what the gentleman from Iowa read that such an addition would be necessary.

Mr. REAGAN. Oh, he was reading about the work way up the Savannah above Augusta, a hundred miles off.

Mr. PAGE. Then it was not included in this.

Mr. REAGAN. No; not a part of it at all. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] What did the gentleman from Iowa read it for, then?

Mr. HUMPHREY. He read it for the amusement of the House.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the words "of which sum $1,000 may be applied to payment of damages for land."

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. REAGAN] that he is mistaken or else the report of the Engineer is wrong. This thousand dollars is for property which the engineers say is not worth more than $500 at the utmost. This refers to this very appropriation.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman is right about that; but he read in reference to pole-boat navigation up the Savannah River above Augusta.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I read about both, and this pole-boat navigation is described in these words:

It is proposed during the current fiscal year to begin the improvement of that portion of the river sixty-four miles in length between Augusta and Trotter's Shoal, with a view of establishing a channel three feet deep for pole-boat navigation.

Mr. REAGAN. Now, if my friend is distressed about pole-boat navigation, we will come to that item after a while. It is a good way from where we now are. We are on the Savannah River, and I make the point of order the gentleman is not discussing the pending question.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I demand a division on my amendment.

The committee divided; and there were ayes 23, noes not counted.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ice-harbor at mouth of Muskingum River, Ohio, $30,000.

Mr. WARNER. I move to strike out "30" and insert "50;" so that the paragraph as amended will read:

Ice-harbor at mouth of Muskingum River, $50,000.

Last year the appropriation for this work was $50,000, which has been expended in excavating for foundations, and to raise the walls on these foundations will require more than is appropriated in this bill. Besides, to go on with the work it is necessary to take out a part of a dam in the river, which, when begun, must be finished the same season; and to do this it will require at least $50,000. If it were not predetermined that no amendment whatever was to be allowed to the bill in committee, I think the Commerce Committee itself would accept this amendment. But I hope that even the determination to allow no amendments will not prevent the amendment I offer from fair consideration. If this harbor had been completed, Mr. Chairman, it would have saved this year perhaps twice the cost of the whole work. It is a work not of merely local importance; it concerns the shipping interests of the whole river from Cincinnati to Pittsburgh. It will probably take a hundred and fifty thousand dollars to complete the whole work, and at $50,000 a year even it will take three years to complete it; while it really ought, in the interest of good economy and the commerce of the Ohio River, to be completed in two years, if not in one. I do not think we should be alarmed at ten millions for all the harbors and rivers of the country. Not less than $250,000,000 will be spent this year in building, improving, and maintaining railroads in the United States. Water transportation is the only competition left against railway combinations. I am as much opposed as anybody to applying the public money to purely local improvements, or wasting it on undertakings that even if carried out to completion would be of little or no value as improvements. Every proposed improvement and every appropriation for improvements should stand here on its merits; and that is all I ask for this amendment, and if it is voted down I know it will not be on its merits, but because it has been determined by a majority to vote down all amendments whether in themselves good or bad.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is now five minutes after six o'clock, [cries of "Read!" "Read!"] and I propose to move that the committee rise. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio that the committee do now rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 91.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now decide this point of order, as it is now presented directly. The point of order made is, that it is necessary to have a quorum in order that the committee may rise. The Chair will decide, and in accordance with a large vote of this House in Committee of the Whole during the last session of this Congress, that a quorum is not necessary to rise; which decision the Chair has here before him. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Michigan City, Indiana: Continuing operations at outside harbor, $30,000.

Mr. CALKINS. I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out "$30,000" and insert "$20,000;" and at the end of line 159——

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Before the gentlemen from Indiana submits his amendment, I want to ask the Chair if he means to hold that less than a quorum can go on with business in Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not so decided.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. That is the practical effect of the decision just given by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not agree with the gentleman from New York. It is not a decision which covers the question of a vote on proposed legislation. If there should be a failure of a quorum to vote on a question of legislation, the question could then be raised; not otherwise.

The gentleman from Indiana will forward his amendment to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 158 the words "thirty thousand dollars" and insert "twenty thousand dollars;" and at the end of the line insert "for continuing the improvement of the inner harbor, $10,000." If amended as proposed it will read:

"For improving harbor at Michigan City, Indiana: Continuing operations at outside harbor, $20,000; and for continuing improvement of the inner harbor, $10,000."

Mr. CALKINS. It will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment I propose does not increase the amount of the appropriation; it merely changes the appropriation and makes it conform to the two bills passed by preceding Congresses. I trust that there will be no objection to it. The appropriation is not sufficient, but I have concluded to make a virtue of necessity and take what is given to us. I hope the amendment will be agreed to. [Cries of "All right!"]

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Calumet, Illinois, $20,000.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman, to this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$20,000," in lines 160 and 161, and insert "$50,000."

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I do not desire, Mr. Chairman, to speak to the amendment but a very brief time, as I am quite hoarse. I desire to say to the committee, however, that there is not probably a place for which provision is made in this bill the improvement of the harbor of which is more important or needs improving more than this one. I have sought the attention of the committee a few moments to represent to the Committee on Commerce, as well as to the Committee of the Whole, the real facts in regard to this place. It is twelve miles from Chicago Harbor to Calumet, and the manufacturing interests which have been centered upon the north and south branches of the city of Chicago, some of the heaviest of them, have commenced building at this harbor of Calumet or South Chicago. The winding rivers and very frequent bridges which cross them at almost every street, certainly at every other street, in the city, has made it difficult for the manufacturing interests to carry on business in Chicago, and they are removing rapidly up to this point, and some are bringing a large amount of ore from the mines of Lake Superior. Of necessity, the vessels shipping ore are deeply laden. They have about twelve and a half feet of water there now to bring in vessels drawing from fourteen to fourteen and a half feet. The business is largely centering in that quarter upon the waters of the Calumet, which are navigable after you get inside for twenty miles; and the manufacturing interests which are congregating all along there, for it will soon all be built up, demonstrate the necessity for this appropriation. The increase in population in one year upon these waters is over fifteen thousand people within two miles of this harbor. One institution alone will before the 1st of May, if they succeed as they expect in completing their works, employ 2,000 artisans. The manufacturing works are steadily increasing at that point.

As I have stated to the committee I do not mean to consume any time in the discussion of this amendment, but I hope sincerely that the committee will enlarge the amount appropriated there. The appropriation of $50,000 asked for in the Engineer's report will complete the present project and will be applied to deepening the channel to the depth of fifteen feet, and extending the piers for its protection to deep water. The amount estimated required for the completion of the existing project is $58,750, and the engineer in charge has stated in his report that he can profitably expend in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, $50,000. The plan for the improvement of this harbor was adopted eleven years ago, and the change in the work and the importance of the point demands this increase. I hope it will be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 73.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS and Mr. KENNA were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 32, noes 81.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. No quorum.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I move that the committee rise and report to the House the fact that it is without a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule prescribes what is the duty of the Chair when the committee finds itself without a quorum, if the point is insisted on.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the committee will not rise.

The question being taken on Mr. PAGE's motion, there were—ayes 46, noes 75.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALDRICH] no quorum appeared. Thereupon the Chair orders the roll to be called, as required by the rule.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer:

The roll having been called, the names of absentees were then called over.

Mr. ATHERTON. I did not hear my name called.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair the name of the gentleman from Ohio was called on both roll-calls.

Mr. ATHERTON. I presume it was. I simply want it understood I was present in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has accomplished his purpose.

Mr. STEVENSON. Before the committee rises I wish it recorded that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McKENZIE] is absent on account of sickness in his family.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter for the House, not for the Committee of the Whole.

The committee rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the river and harbor appropriation bill, and finding itself without a quorum he had, under the rule, directed the roll to be called, and now reported the names of those members who had failed to answer.

Mr. VALENTINE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. REAGAN. We have but a short time of the session left us. There are two general appropriation bills still to be reported and there are other matters which it is necessary Congress should act upon. It is apparent we can only secure the passage of this bill saving the public works and get it out of the way by a little endurance; and we may as well stand it to-night as at any time rather than allow the suspension of all the public works. I hope it will be the pleasure of the House to allow a call to bring here the members who are absent, and that we shall keep a quorum here and go forward with this bill and pass it or defeat it.

Mr. PAGE. I believe this bill can be passed to-morrow. I do not believe there will be any factious opposition to it. I have talked with several members who to-day have raised the point of a quorum, and from what I understand in conversations with them there will be no factious opposition and the bill will finally come to a vote to-morrow. I do not believe we can keep a quorum of the House to-night, and I hope the gentleman who has charge of the bill will consent that the House shall now adjourn. He can call the bill up to-morrow at the usual hour, and I have every reason to believe it will be disposed of by four o'clock.

Mr. REAGAN. I have no doubt the gentleman from California would be glad to see business go on, and if I thought all felt like him I would be disposed to assent to the arrangement he suggests. But we know that is not the case. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. BREWER, who is called home on account of dangerous sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the request of the gentleman from Michigan will be granted. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PAGE. While I am not authorized to speak for gentlemen who may have made some factious opposition, still in conversation with them to-night I am satisfied there will be no factious opposition to-morrow if the arrangement I suggest be agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. They are here. Let them speak for themselves.

Mr. STEVENSON. I request that leave of absence from the sitting of the House to-night be granted to the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. McKENZIE, who is detained from the House on account of sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois, and it is granted.

Mr. VALENTINE, (at 6.45 p. m.) I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having found itself without a quorum, in obedience to the rule the roll of members was called, and the committee rose and its chairman reported to the House the names of those not responding when called. A quorum having appeared, there is nothing now for the Chair to do except to announce that the Committee of the Whole will resume its session upon the river and harbor appropriation bill, unless there be made a motion that the House now adjourn.

Mr. VALENTINE. I have made that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before submitting that motion the Chair desires to request on behalf of the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. SINGLETON, leave of absence for the remainder of to-day's session; two similar requests having just been granted.

Mr. PAGE. I object.

Mr. VANCE. I submit a request that my colleague, Mr. ARMFIELD, be excused from attendance from to-night's session on account of sickness.

Mr. PAGE. If there is to be a night session I do not want any members excused who can attend.

Mr. CHALMERS. The gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. SINGLETON, left the Hall on account of the illness of his wife, and so stated when he left.

Mr. ATHERTON. I desire to submit a request that Dr. FELTON, of Georgia, be excused from attendance at the session of to-night.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska, [Mr. VALENTINE,] that the House now adjourn.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to state that the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. SINGLETON, has been called home by information that his wife is very sick.

Mr. PAGE. I withdraw my objection on that statement.

There being no further objection, Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, was granted leave of absence for to-night's session.

Mr. ATHERTON. Is there any objection to Dr. FELTON, of Georgia, being allowed leave of absence for to-night?

Mr. VALENTINE. If we adjourn at this time there will be no need for these excuses.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. FELTON, will be treated as other gentlemen have been; his family is ill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made for the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. FELTON?

There was no objection; and leave of absence was granted accordingly.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the same for Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia.

Mr. FORT. If I have to stay here to-night I intend that other gentlemen shall stay here too. It will be time enough to excuse these gentlemen when they are called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] object to the leave of absence asked for the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. STEPHENS, for the remainder of to-day's session?

Mr. FORT. I do not object to that; but I say there will be time enough to excuse other gentlemen when the case arises.

There was no objection; and Mr. STEPHENS was granted leave of absence.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to state that I shall object to any leave of absence being granted, except on account of ill health.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. If I can have unanimous consent I would like to say a word.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is called for, which is the motion to adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 38, noes 81.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is not needed to determine the question on a motion to adjourn. The call of the roll, upon the completion of which the Committee of the Whole rose, indicated the presence of a quorum. Under the rule the Committee of the Whole will now resume its session.

The Committee of the Whole accordingly resumed its session, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole resumes its session and will proceed with the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ALDRICH,] upon which no quorum voted when the question was before taken in Committee of the Whole.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 20, noes 85.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. VAN VOORHIS said: No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. VAN VOORHIS and Mr. KENNA were appointed.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALDRICH] who offers the amendment does not make the point that no quorum voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] makes the point, which he has a right to do.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 16, noes 101.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. No quorum has voted.

Mr. REAGAN. In order to save the time that would be consumed in again calling the roll, I move that the committee now rise with the view that a call of the House may be ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, and repair and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. REAGAN. I move a call of the House.

Mr. VALENTINE. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. ATKINS. I dislike very much to rise to a point of order; but I desire to have read the rule in regard to smoking within the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read clause 7 of Rule XIV.

The Clerk read as follows:

While the Speaker is putting a question or addressing the House no member shall walk out of or across the Hall, nor, when a member is speaking, pass between him and the Chair; and during the session of the House no member shall wear his hat, or remain by the Clerk's desk during the call of the roll or the counting of ballots, or smoke upon the floor of the House; and the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper are charged with the strict enforcement of this clause.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By the rule it is made the especial duty of both the officers named to enforce compliance with the rule, which the Chair now directs shall be done.

Mr. McLANE. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know from the Chair whether the right of the House to order a call of the House is not an inherent right, independently of the rule which has reference to a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair conceives that there can be no doubt about the power of the House to compel the attendance of its members; but the question presented by the gentleman from Maryland is not now raised. The gentleman from Texas has moved a call of the House, pending which the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] has moved that the House adjourn. The latter motion takes precedence.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was not agreed to, there being ayes 32; noes not counted.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. REAGAN for a call of the House.

The question having been put,

The SPEAKER pro tempore said: More than fifteen members rising, a call is ordered. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the indulgence of the House, that I may be excused from the remainder of this day's session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the gentleman's request will be granted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires in justice to another member to submit at this time the request which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DAVIDSON asks leave of absence from the House on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the request will be granted.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to ask that the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. HAMMOND, be excused. He has been confined to his room for several days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Excuses are not now in order; but the Chair will state that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] obtained leave of absence to-day.

Mr. REAGAN. I object to leave of absence for Mr. DAVIDSON. He has been here to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair asked for objections, and hearing none stated that leave was granted. Did the gentleman object at the time?

Mr. REAGAN. I did.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the leave is not granted.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. BALLOU. I want to say that I am here.

Mr. SIMONTON. And I wish to say that I am present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Where a member fails to answer upon the roll-call, the Chair has no discretion in the matter.

Mr. REAGAN. I now move that the doors be closed and the absentees sent for.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not necessary to make that motion. The rules require that the doors shall be closed. The Doorkeeper will close the doors.

Mr. PHISTER. I am requested by Mr. BAYNE to ask indefinite leave of absence for him. He is called to Pennsylvania on important business.

The question being taken, leave was granted.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask that the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. BLOUNT, be excused. He is engaged on committee duty.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Shall the gentleman from Georgia be excused?

Mr. ATKINS. As I understand the rule authorizes members of the Committee on Appropriations to be absent during the sessions of the House. They are excused under the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think the rule is as broad as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] understands it to be. It is the impression of the Chair that the rule simply allows the Committee on Appropriations to be in session during the sitting of the House.

Mr. McMAHON. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is actually engaged in preparing the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. ATKINS. That is the fact.

The question being taken on excusing Mr. BLOUNT, there were—ayes 33, noes 21.

Mr. PAGE. No quorum is present, and the gentleman cannot be excused without a quorum. I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAGE. My point of order is that no member can be excused when there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is not needed.

Mr. PAGE. Not to excuse a member?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, a call of the House is ordered by fifteen members and the absentees are noted, and then the doors are closed.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. PAGE. I insist that no member can be excused from attendance without a quorum being present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from California will refer to the second clause of Rule XV he will find it is there expressly provided that on such a vote a quorum is not needed. A call of the House may be ordered by fifteen members. On the noting of the absentees excuses then may be given and members may be excused by a majority of those present. The ayes therefore have it, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is excused.

Mr. SAPP. I desire to ask that Mr. DAVIDSON be excused.

A MEMBER. Why?

Mr. SAPP. He came to me during the afternoon and told me he had a fever and requested I should pair with him. He then left the House, and when he left was quite indisposed. He is not well and ought to be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHELLEY. I ask that my colleague, Mr. CLEMENTS, be excused on account of severe indisposition.

Mr. REAGAN. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 32.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is being proceeded with. Under the call of the House, the time has now arrived for submission of excuses for absentees.

Mr. WILBER. Was there a quorum on the last vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Clerk there was a quorum.

Mr. WILBER. Then what is there to hinder us from moving on with the business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The power of the House to compel the attendance of every absent member if it wants to.

Mr. HERNDERSON. I move that the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. JOYCE, be excused on account of illness. He has been sick for several days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no necessity for such a motion, as the gentleman from Vermont is now absent by leave of the House.

Mr. FRYE. I move that my colleague, Mr. LINDSEY, be excused from further attendance during this session, as his daughter is ill and he is in attendance upon her.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMONTON. In behalf of my colleague, Mr. WHITTHORNE, I move he be excused for the remainder of this session. He has recently been quite ill, and is unable without great detriment to his health to attend these night sessions.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 47.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHELLEY, (at seven o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn, and I insist on my motion being put.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 64.

Mr. SHELLEY demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. The House has already made its order and directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring to the bar of the House the absentees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is mistaken. The House has not yet made this order and is now only hearing excuses for absentees.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I thought the order had been issued.

The question recurred on the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHELLEY demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SHELLEY. I now renew my motion that my colleague, Mr. CLEMENTS, be excused on account of illness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman to renew that motion until other gentlemen who desire to make similar motions have been heard.

Mr. SHELLEY. I do not understand I can be cut off in any such way. There is evidently a misunderstanding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Every member desiring to move an excuse for an absentee has the right to have such opportunity and the gentleman cannot renew his motion until all others have been heard.

Mr. SHELLEY. But suppose I have two colleagues who are sick?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move that the gentleman's colleague, Mr. CLEMENTS, be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is trying to divide the time equally between both sides of the House and now recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move that Mr. CLEMENTS be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Speaker, I was not present when my name was called but returned before the roll-call was finished.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on excusing the gentleman from Illinois on the statement made.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague, Mr. ROTHWELL, who has been sick for three or four weeks and not able to attend the regular sittings of the House, be excused to-night.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. I ask the same privilege myself as I am feeling quite unwell.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I wish to say that General HAMMOND is absent from the city and from the House by leave of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman being absent by leave of the House it is not necessary to make a motion to excuse him.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is now apparent, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot get to any consideration of this bill to-night, and I move that the House take a recess until to-morrow at nine o'clock.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 62.

Mr. CULBERSON. I demand tellers.

Mr. KENNA. If the gentleman insists upon the demand for tellers I shall make the point of order that the motion is not in order; that the House having ordered a call of the House, nothing is in order but to proceed under the call to dispense with further proceedings under the call or to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Texas having been made and submitted to the House without objection, the Chair holds that it is now too late to make a point of order against it, the House having proceeded to a division upon it. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. CULBERSON and Mr. KENNA were appointed.

Mr. WHITE. Is it in order to move an amendment to the proposition?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late now; the House is dividing.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 63.

So the motion for a recess was not agreed to.

Mr. TALBOTT. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is being proceeded with. As fast as members desire to present excuses the Chair will entertain them.

Mr. ACKLEN. I submit the following motion.

Several members demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order, as the Chair has stated, is the excuses of members, or for some gentleman to move that the House now adjourn and dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. ACKLEN. I submitted a motion in connection with the call of the House a moment since.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the proposition of the gentleman from Louisiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without leave of the House.

Mr. ATHERTON. I wish to ask consent of the House——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize every gentleman in order to offer excuses.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the Chair put the motion now pending before the House?

Mr. ATHERTON. I wanted to state before that order is made that the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. FELTON, during the afternoon left the House——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia has already been excused by leave of the House.

Mr. ATHERTON. I wanted to say that I had paired with him on all questions for the remainder of the day, and although I cannot complain that I am continually out of health, yet I wish to state that I am not feeling particularly well, and as I am somewhat of an obstruction to the passage of this bill I ask that the House excuse me.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker——

Several members demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has stated that the regular order under the rule was to receive excuses for absent members. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from West Virginia, who desires to make an excuse for an absent member.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a motion to excuse the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. KNOTT, who is sick, I know.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ACKLEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ACKLEN. I have sent to the desk an order of the House, which has been read, and, as I understand, is now pending before the House. What I wish to ask is, will not that have precedence of any other motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman will consult section 2 of Rule XV he will find that his resolution is not in order until gentlemen have been allowed an opportunity to offer excuses for themselves or for absent members, which opportunity the Chair is now offering.

Mr. ACKLEN. I yield very cheerfully to the superior parliamentary knowledge of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair suggests no superiority of knowledge over the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to submit a motion, Mr. Speaker, as it is very evident that we will be delayed some time before we can succeed in getting a quorum, that perhaps it would be better to ask consent of the House to take a recess until ten o'clock in the morning.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that gentlemen are on the floor offering excuses and that no business can be transacted until members take their seats and observe order.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that my colleague, Mr. MONROE——

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House take a recess until ten o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Iowa, who wish to make excuses, as the Chair understands, for absent members.

Mr. CARPENTER. I ask that Mr. DEERING be excused.

Mr. COOK. I move that all further proceedings under the call of the House be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia will remember that a question is pending upon which a vote is being taken. The question is on the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, that his colleague, Mr. DEERING, be excused from the sittings of the House to-night.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COOK. I now make my motion to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. PAGE. I move that my colleague, Mr. DAVIS, be excused——

Mr. COOK. This will accomplish what the gentleman desires.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who was on the floor and desires to submit a motion?

Mr. COOK. I insist upon my motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 41.

Mr. HUNTON. I demand tellers.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that a quorum is not needed, in the judgment of the Chair, to dispense with further proceedings under the call of the House, or to transact any business in order under a call of the House.

Tellers are demanded; and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. COOK, and the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HUNTON.

Mr. WHITE. On what question are tellers ordered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. SAMFORD. I desire to inquire of the Chair if tellers were ordered?
